Haddan, Rev. Arthur West, B.D., 1816–1873, b. at Woodford, Essex; graduated, first class Lit. Hum., at Trinity College, Oxford, 1837, and elected to two Fellowships; ordained 1840, and in the same year was curate to J. H. Newman; dean of Trinity for several years, and afterwards vice-president; rector of Barton-on-Heath, Warwickshire, from 1857. He edited the works of Archbishop Bramhall and of Herbert Thorndike in the Anglo-Catholic Library, and wrote some of the essays in "Replies to Essays and Reviews." 1. Apostolic Succession in the Church of England, Lon., 1869, 8vo; new ed., 1883. 2. (Trans.) St. Augustine On the Trinity, (The Works of St. Augustine, vol. viii.,) Edin., 1871, 8vo. 3. Remains. Edited by A. P. Forbes, D.C.L., Bishop of Brechin. Lon., 1876, 8vo.

"The papers range over a wide field, and are classified in the table of contents under the heads of 'On the Holy Scriptures,' 'Doctrinal Works,' 'Ecclesiastical History,' 'The Prayer-Book,' 'Miscellaneous,' and 'General History.' Of all of these subjects Mr. Haddan had something to say, but it was in ecclesiastical history that he was most at home."—Sat. Rev., xlii. 301.

With STUBBS, WILLIAM, (ed.) Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents relating to Great Britain and Ireland. Edited after Spelman and Wilkins. Oxf., 1869–71, 3 vols. 8vo.

"The work is really a great one, worthy of the vast labour which has been spent upon it, worthy, we may add, of the many years during which scholars have been waiting for it."—Sat. Rev., xxix. 612.

Haddock, Joseph W. Somnolism and Psychism; or, The Science of the Soul and the Phenomena of Nervation as revealed by Vital Magnetism, Lon., 1851, fp. 8vo; new ed., 1857.

Haddon, Alfred Cort, M.A., F.Z.S., professor of zoology at the Royal College of Science, Dublin. An Introduction to the Study of Embryology. Illust. Lon., 1887, r. 8vo.

Haddon, Miss Caroline, sister-in-law of James Hinton, infra. 1. A Law of Development: an Essay to illustrate some Ideas from the Unpublished Writings of James Hinton, Lon., 1883, cr. 8vo. 2. The Larger Life: Studies in Hinton's Ethics: with some Unpublished Letters of James Hinton, Lon., 1886, p. 8vo.

"She has given us a faithful and undistorted reflex of the main cycles of Hinton's thought. . . . To would-be students this book may serve as an admirable introductory primer."—Acad., xxx. 1.

3. Where does your Interest come from? a Word to Lady Investors, Manchester, 1886, 12mo.

Haddon, John, M.D. Notes from Private Practice, Edin., 1887, 8vo.

Haden, Francis Seymour, F.R.C.S., b. 1818, in London; educated at University College, London, and at the Sorbonne, Paris; became a member of the Royal College of Surgeons in 1842 and a Fellow in 1857. He is distinguished as an etcher, and is president of the Society of Painter-Etchers. 1. Earth to Earth: an Answer to a Pamphlet on "Cremation," Lon., 1875, 12mo; new ed., enl., same year. 2. About Etching: Part I., Notes on a Collection of Etchings by the Great Masters; Part II., An Annotated Catalogue of the Examples exhibited of Etchers' and Painter-Engravers' Work. Illust. Lon., 1879, 4to; 3d ed., 1881, 8vo.

"He is an admirable special pleader, and would fain persuade us by force of eloquence that the moment the early painters discovered that it was possible to act upon the plate by an implement wielded like a pencil they ceased at once to use the burin, and became painters. . . . The slight critical notes on etchers and painter-engravers among the old masters are piquant and often valuable."—Sat. Rev., xlviii. 426.

"This work contains the notes of Mr. Haden upon a recent exhibition of etched work by the great masters from his own collection, to which was added a series of examples of his own handiwork. But, in addition to these notes, he gives us sixteen fac-similes of some of the finest of these examples, (excepting, perhaps, one or two of the number;) and these reproductions are practically as fine in effect as the originals themselves."—Spectator, lii. 1650.

3. The Etched Work of Rembrandt: a Monograph: with an Appendix, Lon., 1879.

Hadermann, Jeannette R. See WALWORTH, MRS. J. R., infra.

Hadfield, Mrs. E. 1. Sprays from the Hedgerows, [verse.] Lon., 1850, 12mo. 2. Poetical Weeds. By E. H. Lon., 1850, 16mo.

Hadfield, H. H. Treatise on Perspective: with Diagrams, Lon., 1858, p. 8vo.

Hadfield, William, 1800–1887, was engaged from an early age in commercial business in South America; was secretary to the Buenos Ayres Great Southern Railway, and in 1863 founded in London The South American Journal and Brazil and River Plate Mail, of which he was chief editor till his death. 1. Brazil, the River Plate, and the Falkland Islands: with the Cape Horn Route to Australia: including Notices of Lisbon, Madeira, the Canaries, and Cape Verde. Illust. Lon., 1854, 8vo. 2. Brazil and the River Plate in 1868: showing the Progress of those Countries since 1853, Lon., 1869, 8vo. 3. Brazil and the River Plate 1870–76: with Supplement, Lon., 1877, 8vo.

Hadley, Amos. 1. New Hampshire Superior Court Reports, vols. xlv.–xlviii., Concord, 1865–69, 4 vols. 8vo. 2. Life of Walter Harriman: with Selections from his Speeches and Writings, Bost., 1888, 8vo.

Hadley, Arthur Twining, b. 1856, at New Haven, Conn.; son of Professor James Hadley, infra; graduated at Yale in 1876, and, after studying at the University of Berlin, became a tutor at Yale in 1879, lecturer on political science in 1883, and professor of political science in 1886. Railroad Transportation: its History and its Laws, N. York, 1885, 12mo.

Hadley, Caroline. 1. Stories of Old; or, Bible Narratives, Lon., 1862, two series, 12mo; new ed., 1868, 1 vol. 2. Children's Sayings; or, Early Life at Home, Lon., 1862, sq. 16mo; new ed., 1885. 3. Stories of the Apostles: their Lives and Writings, Lon., 1864, 18mo; new ed., 1868. 4. Woodside; or, Look, Listen, and Learn, Lon., 1887, p. 8vo.

Hadley, James, 1821–1872, b. at Fairfield, N.Y.; graduated at Yale in 1842, and entered the Theological Seminary, but left that institution to become tutor in mathematics at Middlebury College; tutor in classical history at Yale 1845–48; assistant professor of Greek 1848–51, and from then professor. 1. A Greek Grammar for Schools and Colleges, N. York, 1861, p. 8vo; new ed., rev. and re-written by F. de F. Allen, Lon., 1884. 2. Elements of the Greek Language: taken from the Greek Grammar, N. York, 1870, 8vo. 3. Introduction to Roman Law: in Twelve Academical Lectures, N. York, 1873, 8vo. Posth.

"Admirable an introduction to the Roman law as these lectures are, it was inevitable from their plan that they should convey to the students who heard them or who may read them an exceedingly erroneous impression upon many important points, and that without any actual errors of statement. . . . In such an outline covering so much ground the element of time is practically left out. . . . But, with all these defects, or rather omissions, the book is most admirable."—Nation, xvii. 179.

4. Essays, Philological and Critical, selected from the Papers of James Hadley. [Edited by W. D. Whitney.] N. York, 1873. Posth.

"The scholar who is competent to judge will be impressed, as he reads one after another, with the wide range of reading and reflection and the sound sense and comprehensive judgment which are everywhere shown in them. . . . Most of these essays were prepared for some learned society or periodical; but they are, if not exactly popular, certainly very pleasant and easy reading."—Nation, xvii. 388.

"A volume of papers of a very high order."—Sat. Rev., xxxviii. 314.

5. A Brief History of the English Language, Lon., 1879, 12mo.

Haggard, Henry Rider, b. 1856, at Bradenham Hall, Norfolk, Eng.; son of W. M. R. Haggard, infra; accompanied Sir Henry Bulwer as secretary to Natal in 1875, and in the following year went to the Transvaal on the staff of the special commissioner, and was subsequently appointed master of the High Court of the Transvaal. In 1879 he retired from the colonial service and returned to England, and was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn 1885. 1. Cetywayo and his White Neighbours; or, Remarks on Recent Events in Zululand, Natal, and the Transvaal, Lon., 1882, cr. 8vo; 2d ed., rev., with a new Introduction, 1888.

"Recounts once more from the point of view of an eye-witness the melancholy story of English irresolution and disgrace."—Sat. Rev., liv. 213.

2. Dawn, Lon., 1884, 3 vols. cr. 8vo.

"'Dawn' (a somewhat obscure title) bears many of the familiar marks of inexperience in novel-writing. It is well written, it has considerable interest of plot, and the characters are not borrowed, and show not a little ability in character-drawing. But there is altogether too much of it. . . . He [Mr. Haggard] must 'train down' if he is to write a really good novel."—G. Saintsbury: Acad., xxv. 200.

3. The Witch's Head, Lon., 1884, 3 vols. p. 8vo. 4. King Solomon's Mines, Lon., 1885, p. 8vo; new ed., 1888.

"The success of Mr. Haggard's wonderful story, 'King Solomon's Mines,' is not due exclusively to its merits, though these are great, the romance being one of the most exciting of its kind ever published in a modern language. . . . It has a charm which is not in itself, but in the appeal it makes to a hungry desire or hope which is probably latent in all men, and certainly crops out in the minds of all civilized men,—the desire that the lust of wonder should be fully and, so to speak, honestly satiated; the hope that men will discover some day somewhere something that shall leave them sufficiently, or it may be permanently, astonished."—Spectator, lviii. 1365.

5. She: a History of Adventure: with Fac-Similes, Lon., 1887; 6th ed., (31st to 35th thousand,) 1887, cr. 8vo.

"Mr. Haggard's practical knowledge and experience of savage life and wild lands, his sense of the mystery and charm of ruined civilizations, his appreciation of sport, (especially with big game,) his astonishing imagination, and a certain vraisemblance, which makes the most impossible adventures appear true, (to a reader of sympathetic fancy,) these are the qualities a man admires in 'She,' if he chance to admire it at all."—Andrew Lang: Acad., xxxi. 34.

6. Jess, Lon., 1887, 3 vols. p. 8vo; new ed., 1888. 7. Allan Quatermain: being an Account of his Further Adventures and Discoveries in Company with Sir Henry Curtis, Bart., Commander John Good, R.N., and One Umslopogaas. "Although he is often subtle and original in his conceptions, and felicitously daring in his epithets when seeking to present some true but delicate touch of nature or feeling, an obscurity of narrative . . . arrests his readers in the midst of their enjoyment. . . . Many of the present poems celebrate the delights of virginal love, while the burden of others is remorse or despair."—Ath., No. 2741.

9. The Serpent Play: a Divine Pastoral, Lon., 1883, cr. 8vo.

"Dr. Hake is one of the most earnest and original of poets. He has taken nothing from his contemporaries, but has imagined a message for himself, and has chosen to deliver it in terms that are wholly his own. . . . He concerns himself with absolutes alone, the eternal elements of human life, and the immutable courses of human destiny. . . . That this is so is a reason why his work should be always interesting, as it is also a reason why it should be more or less unpopular. . . . He loves to symbolize; he does not always care that the symbol shall be appropriate and plain."—Sat. Rev., lv. 315.

8. Modern English, Lon., 1873, p. 8vo.

"An attempt to show how the English of to-day differs from that of our grandfathers, and to vindicate the change as proper growth. . . . It is a hard pressed pack of facts. . . . When it is added that the facts are selected with clear-headedness and sound judgment, . . . and that the matter is in great part new and either supplements in important particulars or contradicts our best dictionaries about the history of familiar words, every student of English will see that he needs the book and owes the author no stinted thanks."—Nation, xviii. 158.

"He does not criticise; he reviles. He seems to be in a passion from one end of his book to the other. . . . The book has its use in one way, as any collection of obsolete, uncommon, or novel words and meanings of words has its use."—Sat. Rev., xxxvii. 25.

"Mr. Hall shows that our language, like every other language that possesses any vitality at all, is in a state of constant flux and change and perpetually endeavours to renew its youth. . . . It [the book] abounds with a rich store of quotations such as has seldom been equalled. For every word that is discussed there are crowds of reference."—WALTER W. SKEAT: Acad., v. 97.

"He is a complete master of the complex economic history of the time; and it is not the least of the various merits of his book that it follows out such familiar but abstract facts as the competition for land or the general rise of prices in all the graphic detail of individual lives. . . . The lives of Gresham, Popham, 'Wild' Darrell, Bishop Cox, of Ely, and several minor figures, are illuminated by a host of details in great part new. 'Wild' Darrell is in some sort, as Mr. Hall confesses, the hero of a book otherwise devoted to marring, rather than making, reputations."—Acad., xxxi. 20.

"It is slight, and might with advantage be expanded, but the plan and the execution are both admirable."—Sat. Rev., xxxviii. 181.

"'An adequate work,' said Sir William Harcourt, in the preface to his well-known 'Historicus' letters, 'on the Rights and Duties of Neutrals, founded on a sound basis of historical investigation and judicial decision, has yet to be written.' . . . Mr. Hall has, we think, filled the void, and his work is a valuable and masterly contribution to legal literature."—Spectator, xlviii. 1237.

2. International Law, Oxf., 1880, 8vo; 2d ed., entitled "A Treatise on International Law," 1884.

"Mr. Hall's exposition of international law divides itself into three main branches, relating to (1) 'the law governing states in their normal relations;' (2) 'the law governing states in the relation of war;' (3) 'the law governing states in the relation of neutrality.' Exception may be taken to a proposition or an argument here and there, but the treatise as a whole fulfils its purpose meritoriously."—Ath., No. 2757.

Hamerton, Philip Gilbert, b. 1834, at Laneside, near Shaw, Lancashire; educated at Burnley and Doncaster Grammar-Schools; went to Paris in 1855 to study painting. In 1857 he settled at Loch Awe, but in 1861 returned to France, living first at Sens and afterwards near Autun, and acquiring that intimate knowledge of French life which appears in his writings. He had begun early to contribute to periodicals, and in 1866 he became art-critic to the Saturday Review, but resigned that post two years later, retaining his connection with the paper as an occasional contributor. In 1869 he established a new art review, the Portfolio, devoted chiefly to etching. He has also contributed to the Fortnightly, the Fine Arts Quarterly Review, and other periodicals. He is an honorary member of the Society of Painter-Etchers, and in 1882 received from the French government the university decoration of an Officier d'Académie. 1. "It is seldom that a writer on art approaches his subject in so scientific a spirit of inquiry. He first weighs the capabilities of this particular method of limning separately against all others that are in use, in various kinds of marking and expression, and, having ascertained what special classes of effects can be better produced by it than by any other process, he fairly argues that the artist who applies it with success to these is entitled, as an etcher, to a distinctly higher rank than that of him who only obtains from it such effects as can be produced equally well or better by other means. Thus Mr. Hamerton's inquiry is twofold, its object being not only to determine the position of an etcher among etchers, but also that of etching itself among the graphic arts."—Spectator, xlix. 210.

"This useful little book gives to the amateur and young student both practical knowledge and critical insight."—Sat. Rev., xxxiii. 125.

10. The Intellectual Life, Lon., 1873, p. 8vo.

"Commonplace as the substratum must necessarily be, Mr. Hamerton succeeds in being almost invariably interesting. We do not say that he never falls into platitude. That is a compliment which we could not conscientiously pay to any writer of moral essays with whom we are acquainted. But he succeeds in so illustrating old truths that they come with a certain agreeable freshness."—Sat. Rev., xxxv. 686.

"Perhaps the chief merit of Mr. Hamerton's work is the way in which he insists upon the great truth—equally true in literature, science, and art—that for the very smallest result of any value which the outside world can see, there has been an almost intolerable amount of previous drudgery, of which the outside spectator takes no heed."—Ath., No. 2375.

"The body of the book is chiefly made up of notes on the aspect of the woods at different seasons of the year, the trees which are in leaf, and the varieties of green and brown and red that their leaves present, the plants which make the most show in the foreground, and the flowers which by their number give a general tint to the landscape. But the author makes no attempt to furnish a systematic calendar of vegetation, nor, on the other hand, does he confine himself to mere description of the external aspects of nature. Where occasion offers, he branches off into matters literary, artistic, or didactic, watching with Chaucer the opening of the 'daisie,' sentimentalizing with Wordsworth over the lesser celandine, or moralizing on his own account on the nest-building of birds and other rural pursuits."—Spectator, xlix. 436.

16. Marmorne. This Story is told by Adolphus Segrave, the Youngest of Three Brothers. Bost. and Edin., 1878, p. 8vo. Anon.

"The author has intense artistic susceptibilities, while he is thoroughly conversant with French landscape and architecture. . . . The construction of his plot is clever. . . . His characters are sketched with rare precision and capacity, and with no little originality agreeably flavoured with humour. . . . He has written a novel which is extremely fascinating and eminently picturesque."—Sat. Rev., xlv. 215.

17. Modern Frenchmen: Five Biographies, Lon., 1878, p. 8vo.

"The five persons chosen by Mr. Hamerton to have their lives written are Victor Jacquemont, Henri Perreyve, Rude, Jean Jacques Ampère, and Henri Regnault. . . . He has made a book containing the lives of five almost unknown Frenchmen which deserves to be popular, a book which it is pleasant to read, and which, once read, is not likely to be forgotten."—Sat. Rev, xlv. 760.

18. The Life of J. M. W. Turner, R.A.: with Nine Illustrations etched by Brunet-Debaines, Lon., 1879, p. 8vo.

"The materials are full, condensed, and clear: earnestness of thought occasionally rises into eloquence, and a pervading cheerfulness and healthfulness of tone make the book companionable and pleasant."—Sat. Rev., xlvii. 467.

"He has dealt with a mass of subject matter (Turner's life, his work, and Mr. Ruskin) in a manner totally inadequate to give to the world any essential notion of what Turner did for us. The book we believe to be simply this, —it is a translation by a man of culture of the rather flashy but rich record of anecdotes collected by Mr. Thornbury. In addition we are supplied with Mr. Hamerton's comments upon Turner's shortcomings, his vulgarity, his egoism, his untruth to nature; and Mr. Ruskin is clearly proved to be not a critic, whatever else he may be."—Spectator, lii. 151.

19. The Graphic Arts: a Treatise on the Varieties of Drawing, Painting, and Engraving, in Comparison with Each Other and with Nature. Illust. Lon., 1882, 4to.

"It is the masterpiece of Mr. Hamerton, the goal towards which the various fragments of his previous literary work may now all be seen to have tended.'—Sat. Rev., liv. 581.

"Author, illustrators, printers, and publishers have vied with each other in the production of a volume which is in every respect solid, tasteful, and complete."—Ath., No. 2872.

"He does not take a sufficiently comprehensive view, nor consider enough the subject of graphic art in general, to convey an entirely right conception of the normal characteristics of design in the various processes of painting, drawing, and engraving. . . . Nevertheless, what Mr. Hamerton says of the various graphic processes contains a great deal that is highly interesting and instructive."—Nation, xxxiv. 548. See a letter from Mr. Hamerton, in answer to this review, in the Nation, xxxv. 134.

20. Human Intercourse, Lon., 1884, 8vo.

"It is in new speculation that the book falls so lamentably short. We look in vain for subtle analysis of thought and feeling, for fresh distinction between friendship and love, or between the friendship of persons of the same and persons of different sexes, in fact, for any new word upon those thousand points in human intercourse which modern life and modern culture have made increasingly difficult to manage successfully."—Spectator, lviii. 519.

21. Paris in Old and Present Times: with Especial Reference to Changes in its Architecture and Topography, Lon., 1884, fol. 22. Landscape. Illust. Lon., 1885, fol.

"Its 'dominant idea,' as the author tells us in his preface, is 'the influence of natural landscape upon man,' and although art (and especially the limits of it) is constantly brought before the reader, it takes the second place in the text, and the assertion of its power and beauty is left mainly to the illustrations."—Sat. Rev., lx. 360.

"The author of 'The Graphic Arts' and 'Etching and Etchers' has been blessed with extraordinary good fortune in producing this magnum opus. He has chosen a noble subject, he has devoted all his energies and indomitable patience to its treatment, and he has been seconded by his publishers with such unwonted courage, zeal, and taste that the superb volume before us may be said to represent, so far as this country is concerned, illustration, decoration, typography, and taste in binding at their best."—Ath., No. 2999.

23. Imagination in Landscape Painting. Illust. Lon., 1886, fol.; 2d ed., 1887. (Reprinted from "The Portfolio," with additional illustrations.)

"Mr. Hamerton divides the imagination of the landscape painter into two kinds,—the first of which is simple ocular memory, and the second the power of combining and fusing remembered images into one pictorial whole. . . . Scattered here and there in this book, sometimes where it is least expected, we come upon notes and hints of intermediate kinds of imagination; and we hope that some day he will work upon this field in a more systematic manner."—Cosmo Monkhouse: Acad., xxxi. 98.

24. The Saône: a Summer Voyage: with One Hundred and Forty-Eight Illustrations by Joseph Pennell and the Author, and Four Maps, Lon., 1887, r. 8vo.

"His book leaves a stimulating after-flavour of open-air exercise enjoyed without stupidity, and of rough living judiciously purged of useless brutality or hardship."—Sat. Rev., lxiv. 865.

"The narrative . . . is delightful throughout."—Spectator, lx. 1679.

"Mr. Pennell's remarkable dexterity in drawing in pen and ink has never been more fully exhibited than in his drawings of the Saône."—Cosmo Monkhouse: Acad., xxxii. 396.

25. Portfolio Papers, with Etched Portrait of the Author, Lon., 1888, p. 8vo.

General Criticism:

"He looks so fairly round a question, and advances his conclusions with such moderation, that opposition is disarmed. Indeed, his function would seem to be rather to throw light on all sides of a subject than to penetrate its mystery."—Sat. Rev., lx. 360.

"His plan is to omit as far as possible all technical terms, and, passing by all matters of secondary importance, to confine himself to those leading features by which the battle or campaign is distinguished. Comprehensive without being sketchy, he disregards numbers and events, except so far as they are necessary to the establishment of principles. These principles he takes one by one, illustrating each by some battle or campaign, of which he first gives a simple narration,—afterwards commenting on the errors or skill of the respective commanders,—and then pointing out where the usual rules may, under certain circumstances, be deviated from."—Ath., No. 2018.

"If any reader desires to understand how Prussia won the battle of Prague against Austria, or that of Rossbach against France, he will find ample information in Colonel Hamley's pages; where he may also learn how the military power which was founded in these fields was ruined by the campaign of Jena. To see Napoleon as a tactician, let us look at Colonel Hamley's map of Austerlitz; to see him as a strategist, let us look at the map which shows how skilfully he used his position between the rivers Seine and Marne in his campaign against the Prussians and Austrians in 1814. Or, if we would follow Wellington at Waterloo, Radetzky at Novara, the French Emperor at Solferino, or the Confederate generals at Bull Run, Fair Oaks, and Gettysburg, Colonel Hamley will guide us over all these famous battle-fields."—*Sat. "A book containing sketches of the personal experience of a missionary who resided for thirty-five years in Turkey, chiefly in Constantinople, and giving at the same time various anecdotes and stories, all of which are entertaining, with remarks and inferences which, in many cases, are not borne out by the context. . . . In one respect particularly Dr. Hamlin is untrustworthy as a guide. While knowing little about Russia, he fears and dislikes that country. . . . Dr. Hamlin has given an interesting account of the beginning and the growth of Robert College, the best educational institution in Constantinople, one with which Dr. Hamlin has been from the beginning intimately associated."—Nation, xxvi. 170.

Hampden, Hon. Augustus Charles Hobart-, 1822–1886, known as Hobart Pasha, third son of the Earl of Buckinghamshire; entered the royal navy in 1836; retired from active service in 1860; commanded a blockade-runner on the coast of North Carolina in the civil war, and afterwards entered the Turkish service, and was commander-in-chief of the Black Sea fleet of Turkey in the Russo-Turkish war. His name had been struck off the English navy-list in 1867, but he was reinstated, with the rank of vice-admiral, in 1885. 1. Never Caught: Personal Adventures connected with Twelve Successful Trips in Blockade-Running during the American Civil War, 1863–64. By Captain Roberts, [pseud.] Lon., 1867, 8vo. "The anecdotes and reminiscences are put together in a haphazard way that amply justifies the title. There is no attempt at fine writing, but the admiral knew, no doubt, that his adventures needed no literary setting to recommend them, and had but to be told in a straightforward manner to chain the most indifferent reader's attention."—Ath., No. 3081.

"The part of his book which Americans will read with the liveliest interest is his account of blockade-running during the war of secession. . . . Nowhere does the interest of the narrative flag; and the facts and anecdotes recorded are so many side-lights thrown on the main current of great historical events."—Nation, xliv. 19.

Hardy, Thomas, b. 1840, at a village in Dorsetshire, Eng., of the same family to which Nelson's captain, Thomas Hardy, belonged. He went to school in his native county, and was apprenticed at sixteen to an ecclesiastical architect in the county town. On coming of age he went to London, where he entered as a student of modern languages at King's College, and became a pupil in architecture of Mr. Arthur Blomfield, F.S.A. He received the prize and medal of the Institute of British Architects in 1863 for his essay on Coloured Brick and Terra-Cotta Architecture, winning also in the same year a prize for design. He also wrote art criticism. At about the age of thirty he found his true vein in the writing of fiction, to which he has since mainly devoted himself. He resides at Max Gate, near Dorchester, Dorsetshire, on a hill which overlooks many of the scenes of his Wessex tales. Some of his novels have been translated into French and Dutch, and "Far from the Madding Crowd" was dramatized by the author in 1879 and produced in a modified form in 1882. 1. Desperate Remedies, Lon., 1871, 3 vols. p. 8vo. Anon.

"'Desperate Remedies,' though in some respects an unpleasant story, is undoubtedly a very powerful one. We cannot decide, satisfactorily to our own mind, on the sex of the author. . . . The chief blemish of the book will be found in the occasional coarseness. . . . If the author will purge himself of this, . . . we see no reason why he should not write novels only a little, if at all, inferior to the best of the present generation."—Ath., No. 2266.

"'Elfride Swancourt, a young lady,' has a very distinct, if not a very substantial, character, and there is no lack of individuality about the people who surround her. Mr. Hardy's feminine ideal is not lofty, though perilously attractive, as the story shows."—Ath., No. 2383.

4. Far from the Madding Crowd, Lon., 1874, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"Mr. Hardy has still much to learn, or, perhaps we ought to say, to unlearn, before he can be placed in the first order of modern English novelists. . . . He takes trouble, and is not in a hurry to work off his sketches. They are imaginative, drawn from the inside, and highly finished. They show power also of probing and analyzing the deeper shades of character. . . . The English Bœotian has never been so idealized before. . . . Under his hand Bœotians become Athenians in acuteness, Germans in capacity for philosophic speculation, and Parisians in polish. . . . We feel either that we have misjudged the unenfranchised agricultural classes, or that Mr. Hardy has put his own thoughts and words into their mouths. And this suspicion necessarily shakes our confidence in the truthfulness of many of the idyllic incidents of rustic life which are so plentifully scattered through these volumes. . . . But perhaps it does not very much matter (except to the student of the political capabilities of the agricultural labourer) whether either the conversations or the descriptions are true or false. They are in keeping with the general character of the novel to this extent, that they are worked up with unusual skill and care. Each scene is a study in itself, and, within its own limits, effective. And they all fit into the story like pieces of an elaborate puzzle, making, when they are so fitted in, an effective whole."—Sat. Rev., xxxix. 57.

"By critics who prefer a grain of substance to a pound of shadow it will, we think, be pronounced a decidedly delusive performance; it has a fatal lack of magic. . . . It is inordinately diffuse, and, as a piece of narrative, singularly inartistic."—Nation, xix. 423.

5. The Hand of Ethelberta: a Comedy in Chapters. Illust. Lon., 1876, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"While the whole story is a most elaborate and lively satire on the social falsehoods of our fashionable world, on the vapidness of its life, the hollowness of its sentiment, and the chasms which yawn between it and the honest labour which builds the edifice of its luxury, we do not find much in it that impresses us as if it ever had happened or ever would happen, and are disposed to regard the whole story as a humorous fable illustrating the vices and weaknesses of the upper ten thousand, rather than as a picture of the most characteristic figures in the intellectual society of modern London."—Spectator, xlix. 530.

"We cannot but think that 'The Hand of Ethelberta,' amusing as it is, is hardly worthy of its author's powers."—Sat. Rev., xli. 592.

6. The Return of the Native, Lon., 1878, 3 vols. p. 8vo.

"We maintain that the primary object of a story is to amuse; and in the attempt to amuse us Mr. Hardy, in our opinion, breaks down. . . . He would seem to be steadily subordinating interest to the rules by which he regulates his art. . . . In the rugged and studied simplicity of its subject the story strikes us as intensely artificial. . . . We need not say that Mr. Hardy's descriptions are always vivid and often most picturesque. But he weakens rather than increases their force by going out of his way for eccentric forms of expression which are far less suggestive of his meanings than the every-day words he carefully avoids."—Sat. Rev., xlvii. 23.

"A story of singular power and interest,—very original, very gloomy, very great in some respects, though these respects are not the highest,—and from beginning to end in the highest degree vivid."—Spectator, lii. 181.

7. The Trumpet-Major: a Tale, Lon., 1880, 3 vols. p. 8vo.

"Mr. Hardy in his latest novel has produced perhaps a finer study of character in a certain sense than he has before given to his readers. . . . This central character is surrounded by others, drawn for the most part with the truth and insight which have raised Mr. Hardy to the high place he occupies among novelists of our time."—Sat. Rev., l. 588.

"The present story is not Mr. Hardy's best, but it has some of his best work in it."—Spectator, liii. 1627.

8. A Laodicean; or, The Castle of the De Stanceys: a Story of To-Day, Lon., 1881, 3 vols. p. 8vo.

"The book has undoubted interest both because Mr. Hardy has written it and because it is in many ways so unlike anything else that he has written. Whether he has made his new departure in the right direction is another question."—Sat. Rev., liii. 53.

"In previous works . . . Mr. Hardy has shown a talent for depicting heroines the reverse of commonplace, and belonging to a class of their own. . . In the work before us this talent is displayed in the picture of Paula Power. . . . The study of this curious, uncommon, but by no means inconceivable middle-class young lady is very interesting."—Spectator, lv. 296.

9. Two on a Tower: a Romance, Lon., 1882, 3 vols. p. 8vo.

"There is not, from beginning to end, a single gleam of probability in the plot, and what good can be served by violating all natural motives in order to produce such unpleasant results we are at a loss to see."—Spectator, lvi. 154.

10. The Mayor of Casterbridge: the Life and Death of a Man of Character, Lon., 1886, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"Mr. Hardy has not given us any more powerful study than that of Michael Henchard. . . . We cannot express too warmly our admiration for the art with which that stalwart and wayward nature has been delineated and all the apparently self-contradictory subtleties of his mood have been portrayed."—Spectator, lix. 752.

11. The Woodlanders, Lon., 1887, 3 vols. p. 8vo.

"Every incident contributes to the development of the story; every touch helps to put the reader in the frame of mind in which the author would have him be. The various aspects of the woodland in the midst of which the story is laid, for example, are worked in with inimitable skill."—Ath., No. 3100.

12. Wessex Tales: Strange, Lively, and Commonplace, Lon., 1888, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

General Criticism:

"Mr. Hardy has rare qualities,—a keen observation of nature, a knowledge of country life and its ways that George Sand might envy, and . . . a tragic force which few writers possess."—Sat. Rev., xli. 593.

"Mr. Hardy seems, after a preliminary trial of several kinds, to have finally chosen as his branch of fiction that which, for want of a better name, may be called the modern romantic. That is, he takes the present for his time, and such people as move among us at the present for his characters; but he makes his characters do things, and puts them into positions, which, if not impossible, would at least be thought very remarkable, and worthy of a leading article in every daily paper, if they had really been reported by a living witness. This must be called the second order of fiction, as it is distinctly inferior, in an artistic point of view, to that which produces its effects solely with the materials of every-day life; but in the hands of a master, who is capable of seeing how people might probably act and speak in improbable circumstances, it is by no means unsatisfactory."—Ath., No. 2529.

"While Mr. Hardy has enough superficial knowledge of human nature to give an air of plausibility and life to all he paints, he has not enough—or, at least, seldom shows enough—to engrave individual figures on our mind as figures which take leave to live in our memories, and which positively enlarge the sphere of our expectations."—Spectator, xlix. 530.

"He has a telling instinct for the value of sex: his heroines are profoundly feminine, his heroes thoroughly, and at times comically, masculine. . . . He never misses the comic aspect of a situation or episode, and yet he never enforces it by a coarse or unsympathetic touch: the light falls gently and sweetly upon it, and passes on. A great many modern novelists would never be humorous if there were not so great a demand for humour nowadays; . . . but Mr. Hardy is humorous inevitably and inadvertently. . . . On the other hand, genius of Mr. Hardy's order is not capable of the loftier and more powerful efforts of tragedy; its furthest range in this direction should be limited by the pathetic, and this involves never altogether losing sight of the humorous. Now, in true pathos Mr. Hardy has no living superior, but his attempts in the way of tragedy have not been satisfactory. . . . When Othello kills Desdemona, the act only makes him more Othello than he was before; but when Eustacia drowns herself on Egdon Heath, she leaves the Eustacia that we believe in safe on the bank."—Spectator, liii. 1627.

"He has never risen much above nor sunk much below the level of his 'Under the Greenwood Tree.' In all his succeeding novels we have had the same delicacy of observation, the same curious combination of felicity with infelicity of expression, the same success in getting what may be roughly called tone, without much faithfulness in other equally important matters."—Nation, xxxii. 16.

Hardy, Sir Thomas Duffus, [ante, vol. i., add.,] 1804–1878, b. in Jamaica: was appointed in 1819 a junior clerk in the Record Office, and in 1869 succeeded Sir Francis Palgrave as deputy keeper of the Public Records. (The question discussed in these reports is the date of the Utrecht Psalter, Sir T. D. Hardy contending that the MS. belongs to the sixth century, while his opponents assign it respectively to the seventh, the eighth, the ninth, and the tenth century.)

"There can, we think, be no reasonable doubt that the handwriting is actually that of the sixth century; or, if not, that it is a copy of a later period, imitating the style of the sixth century."—Nicholas Pocock: Acad., vi. 113.

4. Memorials of a Quiet Life, Lon., 1872, 2 vols. p. 8vo; 18th ed., 1884.

"Francis, Augustus, Julius, and Marcus Hare, 'the most brotherly of brothers,' as Landor called them, are prominent figures here; but the central character of the book is Mrs. Augustus Hare, of whose life we have minute particulars from childhood to old age, and from whose diary copious extracts are given."—Spectator, xlv. 1592.

"Two very thick volumes expended on the quiet life of a clergyman's widow unknown to fame might test even a steady reader's powers to the utmost. . . . Impatient turning of the leaves produces only discouragement; but begin at the beginning, and the well-principled effort is rewarded by forming acquaintance with a really high-minded, unworldly, and intellectual group of people presenting a picture of aims, pursuits, and habits which raise them sufficiently above ordinary folks and their doings to make them well worth knowing."—*Sat. 5. Wanderings in Spain. Illust. Lon., 1873, p. 8vo; 3d ed., 1876.

"Here is the ideal book of travel in Spain; the book which exactly anticipates the requirements of everybody who is fortunate enough to be going to that enchanted land; the book which ably consoles those who are not so happy, by supplying the imagination from the daintiest and most delicious of its stores. . . . The book seizes upon one's mind with a fascination like that of the Far East, with its mingled delight in grand nature, and its subtle, distant human sympathy with a past and a present quite unlike the past and present of our own race and country."—Spectator, xlvi. 111.

"One of the charms of his volume is the number of legends and anecdotes that the traveller will seek in vain in the guide-books. . . . It is a book that will bear reading repeatedly when one is moving among the scenes it describes."—Sat. Rev., xxxv. 154.

6. Days near Rome. Illust. Lon., 1875, 2 vols. cr. 8vo; 3d ed., 1884.

7. Memorials of a Quiet Life: Supplementary Volume. With Fifty-Seven Photographs. Lon., 1876, p. 8vo.

"This volume is given in accordance with the earnest request from many distant quarters for the actual and accurate representation of the places and of the persons mentioned in 'Memorials of a Quiet Life.' . . . The additional letter-press given consists of further selections from the unpublished letters and journal of Mrs. Augustus Hare, and a few of the letters of Archdeacon Hare."—Ath., No. 2548.

"The last volume which he has given to his peculiar audience is chiefly made up of copies of the portraits of all the Hares and all their connections and all the houses in which they ever lived, notwithstanding that there is nothing at all remarkable either in the faces or the houses of this alarmingly well-known family."—Spectator, xlix. 866.

8. Cities of Northern and Central Italy, Lon., 1876, 3 vols. p. 8vo.

"With one or two exceptions, . . . we have scarcely found a single piece of description or information (and we have collated a good many) with which a student of the red book [Murray's "Hand-Book for Northern Italy"] would not be fully as well acquainted as Mr. Hare himself."—Ath., No. 2532.

"His accounts of scenery and travelling are obviously inspired, in the majority of instances, by a personal and even intimate acquaintance with the localities described. He gives us information and guidance not to be obtained at all elsewhere, or, at least, to be collected with difficulty."—Spectator, xlix. 1285.

9. Walks in London, Lon., 1878, 2 vols. p. 8vo; 5th ed., rev., 1883.

"So much of late years has been written about London that a new work on the subject is not likely to contain much original matter; but the author has gone over the ground himself, in addition to a careful study of authorities, and personal observation has enabled him to use his book-knowledge effectively. . . . 'Walks in London' is a book for perusal as well as for reference."—Spectator, li. 155.

10. The Life and Letters of Frances, Baroness Bunsen, Lon., 1878, 2 vols. 8vo; 3d ed., 1882.

"Mr. Hare has, on the whole, exercised a wise discretion in allowing the letters to tell their own story, but he might with advantage have curtailed a little both at the beginning and the end of the book."—Ath., No. 2672.

11. Cities of Southern Italy and Sicily, Lon., 1883, cr. 8vo.

"It is pleasant to have set before us, by means of Mr. Hare's excellent word-painting, the many classic and mediæval buildings with which these districts abound, especially as these antiquarian subjects are every now and then agreeably enlivened by sketches of romantic scenery and curious aspects of ancient and modern life."—Spectator, lvii. 417.

"There seems to be no reason to doubt that this is a very complete collection of the songs of Lancashire. . . . The editors are rather insatiable, and all seems to be grist that is brought to their song and ballad mill. It is so with the songs of the Cotton Famine. . . . Nevertheless it is in these and the other ballads and songs in the dialect of the country that the true force and pathos of the volume lie." —Spectator, xlviii. 373.

Harris, Joel Chandler, b. 1848, at Eatonton, Ga.; was apprenticed to a printer, and afterwards studied law, and practised at Forsyth, Ga.; editor of the Atlanta Constitution, 1890. 1. Uncle Remus: his Songs and his Sayings; the Folk-Lore of the Old Plantation: with Illustrations by Frederick S. Church and James H. Moses, N. York, 1880, 12mo.

"Mr. Harris . . . is a literary artist, and his thirty-four tales . . . are ingeniously and charmingly set in an episodical narrative, in which 'Uncle Remus' figures as the conteur and a little boy as the rapt auditor. . . . The work has five divisions: the fables, plantation proverbs, Uncle Remus's songs, a true story of the war, and Uncle Remus's sayings."—Nation, xxxi. 398.

"Deserves to be placed on a level with 'Reineke Fuchs' for its quaint humour, without reference to the ethnological interest possessed by these stories, as indicating, perhaps, a common origin for very widely-severed races."—Spectator, liv. 445.

2. Nights with Uncle Remus: Myths and Legends of the Old Plantation, Bost., 1883, 12mo.

"The mine of which he first fairly revealed the richness has, meantime, been still further opened up, . . . until in addition to the thirty-four of the former series we have seventy-one new tales placed before us."—Nation, xxxvii. 422.

3. Mingo, and other Sketches in Black and White, Bost., 1884, 12mo.

"His perception is subtler and more truthful than Bret Harte's. . . . Both authors have keen instincts and insights, but Harris's are the finer and deeper. Harte's characters are by far the more picturesque, his incidents are more thrilling, but Harris's people wind themselves about our hearts and owe little to circumstance."—Nation, xxxix. 115.

General Criticism:

"No living writer has struck so powerful and original a note as he has sounded throughout the six tales which made his reputation. In these he forgets all other literature, and sees and is possessed solely by the life which he portrays. So vigorous and veracious is the conception that all extraneous and reflected matter is left behind, as the impurities of a solution are rejected when it crystallizes."—Spectator, liii. 1194.

"He has plenty of humour, both artificial and real, and plenty of true imaginative wit; he has a sure eye for character of a certain sort, an excellent faculty of description, both didactic and dramatic, and a very masterful apprehension of effect; he is capable of pathos and he is capable of drama; he has imagination of the right romantic quality; he is an adept in certain sorts of passion; and he has abundant knowledge of certain classes of motive. He is hardly ever faultless; for even when he is at his best and highest it is never clear that a touch of unveracity, a trace of the practised stage manager, a blunder in tact, a discord in sentiment, will not spoil all. But he now and then goes straight to the heart for all that, and within his limits there is no living writer who can improve upon him."—Ath., No. 2786.

"Perhaps the most eminently distinctive feature of Mr. Bret Harte's manner is suggestiveness, a quality in which, we think, his writing is hardly to be surpassed. By this we mean the power of suggesting definite, not indefinite, ideas. . . . With a few touches, thrown as it were by accident, he describes remote or trivial consequences so as to carry our thought at once to the centre of the action. Nor do we come to resent this as a trick of manner; partly because Mr. Bret Harte knows how to apply it with infinite variety, partly because it is really not artificial, but founded on the truth of human nature. . . . The purely humorous aspect of Mr. Bret Harte's writings is both the most familiar and perhaps the most difficult to give an account of. . . . The curious irony—using the word in its original sense of under-statement—which runs through the whole is generic rather than individual. But our author embodies it in a quiet, easy flow of verse peculiar to himself which sets it off admirably. . . . His Californian tales, beyond their interest as works of fiction, have a truth which, if not exactly literal, is better than much that passes for historical truth. . . . They give us a picture, everywhere so striking and consistent that even without confirmation—which, however, is not wanting—it must be accepted as faithful, of a strange transitory phase of civilization which already belongs to the past."—*Sat. "Mr. Hartley is a writer of real power, both dramatic and humorous. He is not devoid, either, of pathos. . . . The permanent value of the book consists in its pictures of working-men's life and thought in the Yorkshire of the nineteenth century. Where, without straining after fun, Mr. Hartley confines himself to tracing such pictures and letting the humour flow naturally out of them, his workmanship is of its kind simply perfect, and reminds one of nothing so much as of a first-rate Teniers."—Spectator, lii. 1225.

"We have seldom read through a modern novel which left a worse taste behind it than this. At the same time, we cannot but admit that the author shows considerable power in handling his materials. His canvas, indeed, is crowded to such an extent that the sketches are of the slightest; but each character stands on its own feet, and is not merely a lay figure, and the story, such as it is, never flags. "Among the contemporary chroniclers of the realities of Irish life the author of 'Hogan, M.P.,' occupies a prominent place, and her latest venture will greatly enhance a deservedly high reputation. 'Ismay's Children' opens admirably, and improves on closer acquaintance, being marked to a singular extent by a combination of qualities rare in female writers,—strength, breadth of humour, and impartiality. . . . No one who is anxious to fathom the enigma of the Irish character will be deterred by such considerations ["Hibernicisms" in the style, &c.] from the careful study of what we have no hesitation in pronouncing to be the most valuable and dispassionate contribution towards the solution of that problem which has been put forth in this generation in the domain of fiction."—Ath., No. 3129.

Hassaurek, Friedrich, 1832–1885, b. in Vienna; removed to the United States in 1848; was U.S. minister to Ecuador from 1861 to 1865, when he became editor of the Cincinnati Volksblatt. 1. Four Years among Spanish-Americans, N. York, 1867, 16mo; 3d ed., 1881.

"A journey from the sea-coast to the interior, a sojourn at Quito, and a principal excursion into Northern Ecuador, —such is the frame upon which this agreeable, almost charming, and altogether instructive book is built. There is scarcely any point as to which the average or the cultivated reader might desire to be informed that the author has omitted in these graphic pages. . . . The author is not only cognizant of his subject, but has it well in hand, knows especially what to select and what to reject, and withal is a capable observer and a trustworthy narrator." —Nation, v. 477.

"In the five hundred and seventy pages of Mr. Hatton's two volumes a diligent search would perhaps reveal ten pages which might fairly be described as Mr. Irving's impressions of America. The remainder is the most heterogeneous collection that it has ever been our fortune to meet in the shape of a book. . . . Illust. Lon., 1888, 2 vols. demy 8vo.

"The greater part of the contents are cast in the form of conversations or interviews, for the accuracy of which Mr. Toole has gone bail. . . . Mr. Hatton has fulfilled his peculiar and not very dignified undertaking very creditably. . . . He has put together in a readable form a great mass of anecdotes—some of them quite excellent—bearing on the life of a popular actor on and off the stage; and he has certainly contrived to give us . . . a clear notion of the individuality of the central figure."—Spectator, lxi. 1645.

Haweis, Rev. Hugh Reginald, M.A., b. 1838, at Egham, Surrey; graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge, 1861; perpetual curate of St. James's, Marylebone, since 1866. He was musical critic and writer of leading articles on the staff of the Echo, and in 1868 became editor of Cassell's Magazine. 1. Music and Morals, Lon., 1871, p. 8vo; 13th ed., 1885.

"A somewhat heterogeneous and unequal book. It is full of pleasant reading, and contains many good criticisms and descriptions; but its theories are often very questionable, and its survey of facts omits much that is essential."—Spectator, xliv. 1467.

"'Music and Morals' is a comprehensive term; and it is made here to convey an elaborate analysis of the connection of music with emotion, as well as some critical comments on its position with reference to individual morality, and to its influence and significance in society at large. We cannot commend too highly Mr. Haweis's general exposition of the theory of music as the most profound and subtle artistic instrument for expressing emotion."—Sat. Rev., xxxii. 726.

2. Thoughts for the Times, Lon., 1872, p. 8vo; 10th ed., 1877.

"Mr. Haweis writes not only fearlessly, but with remarkable freshness and vigour. He is occasionally eloquent, and even pathetic. In all that he says we perceive a transparent honesty and singleness of purpose. . . . Mr. Haweis starts with the assertion that there ought to be no fixed dogmas in religion. Doctrine, faith, and morals are all to be progressive."—Sat. Rev., xxxiv. 478.

"The actual details of the musical life of the writer . . . constitute a comparatively small part of his work, which consists chiefly of two distinct elements,—a philosophical and a historical. . . . Mr. Haweis's thoughts upon the whole rationale of music appeal to us as . . . entirely true."—Spectator, lvii. 617.

Hawthorne, Julian, b. 1846, in Boston, Mass.; son of Nathaniel Hawthorne, infra; went to Europe with his parents in 1853, and after their return entered Harvard in 1863, but did not graduate. He began the study of civil engineering at the Lawrence Scientific School of Harvard, and was a student in Dresden, Germany, in 1868–70. From 1870 to 1872 he was employed as a hydrographic engineer in the department of docks in New York. In 1872 he went abroad, spent two years in Dresden, and from 1874 till 1881 resided in London, where he was for two years on the staff of the Spectator and contributed to reviews and magazines. In 1882 he returned to New York. 1. Bressant: a Romance, Lon., 1873, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"We are glad to find that Mr. Julian Hawthorne's first work has a sufficient character of its own to mark it off from the writings of that most original of American authors, his father. . . . While we freely concede great merit to 'Bressant,' we must at the same time admit that its faults are still greater. The admirable promise of the first volume is not fulfilled in the second."—*Sat. "By the help of his father's very copious notes of the sayings and doings and looks of the children, . . . and with his own recollections of boyhood to draw upon besides for the later period, he has taken us into the intimacy of the household, and confided the charm and dignity and wisdom of Hawthorne's fatherhood. . . . The biography is like Mr. James's 'Hawthorne' in that it fails to give any history of that immortal part of the man in which the world takes interest."—Nation, xxxix. 525.

Hawthorne, Nathaniel, [ante, vol. i., add.,] 1804–1864. In 1857, after retiring from the consulship at Liverpool, Hawthorne travelled on the Continent, making a long stay in Italy. He returned to England in 1859, and in 1861 (1860?) to America, where he again took up his residence at Concord. He died at Plymouth, N.H., while on a trip to the White Mountains with ex-President Pierce. For biog., see Hawthorne, Julian, supra, and James, Henry, infra. 1. The Marble Faun, Bost., 1860, 12mo; Eng. ed., entitled "Transformation; or, The Romance of Monte Beni," Lon., 1860, 3 vols.

"It has a great deal of beauty, of interest and grace; but it has, to my sense, a slighter value than its companions, and I am far from regarding it as the masterpiece of the author, a position to which we sometimes hear it assigned. The subject is admirable, and so are many of the details; but the whole thing is less simple and complete than either of the three tales of American life."—Henry James: Hawthorne, ("English Men of Letters,") Amer. ed., p. 160.

[Edited by his Widow.] Bost., 1870, 2 vols. 12mo.

"There remains to be noted the occasional shrewdness of observation; some anecdotes of men like Buchanan, Thackeray, Jerrold, and Lord Houghton; a few good descriptions of show-places in England and Scotland, and, finally, the general readableness, in virtue of the writer's celebrity, as well as of the skill with which he does the work in hand, and the intrinsic interest of the things he writes about."—Nation, xi. 59.

6. Passages from the French and Italian Note-Books of Nathaniel Hawthorne, Lon., 1871, 2 vols. 8vo.

"His journals throw but very little light on his personal feelings, and even less on his genius per se. . . . They deepen our sense of that genius, while they singularly diminish our impression of his general intellectual power. . . . These volumes of Italian notes, charming as they are, are on the whole less rich and substantial than those of England. The theme in this case is evidently less congenial. . . . We seem to see him strolling through churches and galleries as the last pure American, attesting by his shy responses to dark canvas and cold marble his loyalty to a simpler and less encumbered civilization."—H. James, Jr.: Nation, xiv. 172.

7. Septimius Felton; or, The Elixir of Life, Bost., 1872, 12mo. Eng. ed., entitled "Septimius: a Romance," Lon., 1872. (This was edited by Una Hawthorne.)

"Of course it cannot take rank with Hawthorne's finished works, but no other author of our time could have written it."—Ath., No. 2330.

"After making allowance for the incomplete state of the story, we must confess that to our taste Hawthorne appears to have in this case ventured rather too far into the dim dreamland of the grotesque and unnatural. The story, however, is powerful and interesting as it stands. . . . The art is admirable, but we can hardly call it healthy. It will commend itself, however, to the lover of the rarer literary essences, though it may probably remain caviare to the vulgar."—Sat. Rev., xxxiv. 89.

Dr. Grimshawe's Secret: a Romance. Edited, with Preface and Notes, by Julian Hawthorne. Bost. and Lon, 1883, p. 8vo. (A fragment.)

"The publication of 'Dr. Grimshawe's Secret,' though it contains detached passages which are full of Hawthorne's thought and style, cannot add to Hawthorne's reputation."—Sat. Rev., lv. 25.

"While it abounds in passages marked by all the beauties of Hawthorne's best writing, it is as a whole crude and raw. . . . The lover of Hawthorne will be glad to find in the fact that the book required 'editing' a justification for declining to become interested in it, at least until he knows more precisely what the limits of the editor's labors were."—Nation, xxxv. 66.

Hayward, Abraham, [ante, vol. i., add.,] 1801–1884, b. at Wilton, Wiltshire; was articled to a solicitor, but afterwards entered at the Middle Temple, was called to the bar in 1830, and became queen's counsel in 1845. Though the founder of the Law Magazine, which he edited 1828–44, and a special student of the literature and history of law, he had only a small practice, and was known chiefly as a literary man and raconteur. He was for many years a constant contributor to the Quarterly Review and to other periodicals. For biog., see CARLISLE, HENRY E., supra. 1. "Mr. Hayward's Essays . . . rather gain than lose by reproduction in a collective form; for the reader becomes accustomed to Mr. Hayward's mode of treatment, which is characteristic, though it is exempt from mannerism."—Sat. Rev., xxxv. 184.

"A master of the processes by which half a score of huge books may be boiled down into a single article, he puts his facts into the concisest language, and, having made a point, leaves it to commend itself. Hence comes the defect of some of his papers; a redundancy of anecdotes which fail to produce a satisfactory effect, because they thrust one another out of the reader's memory."—Ath., No. 2363.

"He is popular because he overflows with anecdote and personal story. It would be unjust to say that he is nothing if not anecdotical. . . . But, were it not for their redundancy of gossip about memorable persons, his volumes would offer few attractions to ordinary readers."—Ath., No. 2408.

"An inexhaustible knowledge of good stories, combined with the rarer power of telling them well, and a great familiarity with the lighter literature of modern times, make these essays very enjoyable reading for an idle hour. Whether they have cost Mr. Hayward much thought, or whether that which has not cost the author much thought can be of any real service, are questions which it is perhaps as ridiculous to ask as it would be to ask whether a moss-rose were good to eat."—SAMUEL R. GARDINER: Acad., v. 250.

9. Selected Essays, Lon., 1878, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"There is no better or more pleasant way of describing people than by recording their best sayings and most characteristic actions, and there is nobody in our generation who has shown such a power as Mr. Hayward of extracting titbits from biographical memoirs, stringing them in a natural order and supplementing them from his own sources."—Acad., xv. 91.

"Some time back he published the first two volumes of the present work; they showed a great deal of industry, but they were full of the most ludicrous blunders. . . . We criticised him severely, and by way of answer he has rewritten his two volumes from beginning to end. . . . We have, on the strength of this reform, made a second attempt to read through Mr. Hazlitt's history, and we have a second time broken down. . . . He knows what the chroniclers tell him, but to try those chroniclers by the received laws of historical criticism is a thought which never occurred to him. . . . "The books noticed by Mr. Hazlitt in this volume are all rare. . . . Perhaps it would be safe to say that three-fourths of the books named in it are unique. . . . There are very few that are worth reading; . . . and we may look on the mania for collecting them as a harmless form of the prevalent insanity. To such collectors Mr. Hazlitt's book is simply indispensable; nor will it be absolutely useless to the student of the history of English literature."—Sat. Rev., xli. 560.

The "Romance" of Peasant Life in the West of England, Lon., 1872, p. 8vo; 2d ed., enl., same year.

"An account of a rather unique vacation-tour, which was almost exclusively devoted to examining into the present condition of the agricultural poor of apparently his native county, Somersetshire. . . . Few questions . . . can be either more important or more sad to an English mind, allied to an English heart of only ordinary kind feeling, than the one of which the greater part of this little book treats."—Spectator, xlv. 1366.

"One would wish to know something more about the antecedents of this vigorous lady, who suddenly, without friends or relations, lands at Durban in December, 1878, and is equal to anything, from nursing, teaching, and cooking, to grooming her horses and ordering and superintending the flogging of a Kaffir. We learn incidentally that she was born in Ireland and has been in India, and, incidentally also, that she went out to learn farming in the Transvaal. . . . She has given us an amusing and interesting book."—Acad., xxi. 56.

Hemans, Charles Isidore, 1817–1876; son of Mrs. Hemans, the poetess; passed most of his life in Italy, chiefly at Rome, where he was honorary secretary and librarian of the English Archæological Society. 1. Catholic Italy: Part I. Rome and the Papal States, Lon., 1860. 2. The Story of Monuments in Rome and her Environs, Florence, 1864–65, 2 parts, 8vo. 3. A History of Ancient Christianity and Sacred Art in Italy, Lon., 1867, cr. 8vo.

"It contains, in the first place, a sketch of the leading events of ecclesiastical history in relation to the Popes and the local Roman Church during the first nine centuries, illustrated by the minute knowledge of monumental and other antiquities acquired by one who has been for many years a resident in Rome. It also contains an elaborate account of the religious art treasures of Rome and Ravenna, based on a careful and minute inspection, and some notice of the churches and religious monuments of other Italian cities. . . . Mr. Hemans's book possesses a further and very exceptional value, as recording the impression made by long acquaintance with the present life and historic memorials of the great Christian metropolis, especially the Catacombs, on an educated man of deeply religious sentiment who several years ago joined the Roman Catholic Church and has recently left its communion. . . . It is then in the author's estimate of the past and present of Catholicism, and in his anticipations of its future, that the main interest of this remarkable volume centres."—Sat. Rev., xxiv. 572.

"A more transparently candid writer, being also a man of strong religious convictions, we never recollect to have fallen in with; . . . but we are often tempted to wish that he had taken more pains to systematize his knowledge and present us with the broad results."—Sat. Rev., xxviii. 191.

"The record of the adventures of three adventurous Englishmen on a journey undertaken in the year 1870. . . . The leader of the expedition was Mr. Shaw, who had already attracted attention by his account of a visit to Yarkand and Kashgar in 1868. Mr. T. D. Forsyth, a well-known civilian, represented the Government of Lord Mayo; and observations were made, specimens were collected, and a narrative of the journey was written, by Dr. Henderson, the medical officer attached to the expedition. The writer of the account has found an able coadjutor in a son of the late member for Montrose, Mr. Allan Hume. . . . The work, though chiefly attractive to botanists and ornithologists, is by no means unsuited to the general reader."—Sat. Rev., xxxvi. 182

Henry, James, M.D., d. 1876, æt. 78; b. at Dublin; graduated with the classical gold medal at Trinity College in 1818; attained eminence and large practice as a physician in spite of his unorthodox religious opinions, and of the enmity of the profession incurred by his sarcastic tracts and his habit of charging only five shillings a visit, on the ground that "no doctor's opinion was worth a guinea." Having been enriched by a large legacy, he gave up medicine and devoted himself to scholastic pursuits, chiefly with the object of obtaining the materials for a complete commentary on the Æneid of Virgil, and, with this end in view, began, about 1848, a series of journeys throughout Europe, accompanied by his wife, and, after her death, by his daughter, wandering for the most part on foot, searching for every rare edition and ill-collated MS. of his favorite author, and becoming acquainted with scholars and librarians in all the principal cities and seats of learning. After a full quarter of a century thus employed, he returned to Dublin, where he spent his few remaining years, diligently prosecuting his researches in the Library of Trinity College. See an article by J. P. Mahaffy, Academy, vol. x. p. 162. The following list of Dr. Henry's works is chiefly derived from Mr. Mahaffy's article. They were all, or nearly all, printed for private circulation, except the second volume of the last mentioned, which was a posthumous publication. 1. Miliaria accuratius descripta: Thesis habita in Univ. Dub., 1832, 8vo. 2. A Dialogue between a Bilious Patient and a Physician, Dublin; 2d ed., Dublin, 1838; 6th ed., 1843. 3. "In his 'Twelve Years' Journey through the Æneid of Virgil' Dr. Henry first disclosed to the world that a great new commentator on Virgil had arisen, and those who will look through Conington's work will see how many of the best and most original notes are ascribed to Henry."—J. (Vol. i. part i. printed at Leipsic.)

"It is like the work of a sixteenth-century scholar, of a man who studied and thought and wrote without hurry or care, who loved his subject and scorned the applause of the vulgar crowd. As such, and as the fullest and best exegesis ever attempted of Virgil, Dr. Henry's commentary cannot fail to take a permanent and unapproachable place."—J. P. MAHAFFY.

"Miss Hickson has examined the truth of the matter . . . with the accuracy, acumen, and patient impartiality of an ideal historian. Mr. Froude, who admits that he has on former occasions smarted under her criticisms, acknowledges that there exists the strongest influence to bias her to the Irish view. 'She has no English prejudices, she is the descendant of some of the exiled and transported Irish and Anglo-Irish of 1649, she is keenly alive to the wrongs which her country has suffered at English hands, and on some points she is in full sympathy with Irish Nationalism.' Yet, in the face of such influences, Miss Hickson finds herself compelled to give judgment in favour of the English contention."—Spectator, lviii. 1011.

"Sir Rowland Hill had in his lifetime written, and it seems printed, a voluminous 'History of Penny Postage,' which, it need hardly be said, was an autobiography in all but the name. . . . Dr. Hill has probably done well to make this first edition of his uncle's life complete enough to be a book of reference for all who are interested in the subject. He may very likely have an opportunity of preparing a more popular edition, and then he would be well advised to . . . include only a few extracts from Sir Rowland's own work, and, giving his own share of the book intact as it now is, to refashion the rest in the same style and form."—*Sat. "It is not possible to read this biography of Mr. Matthew Davenport Hill without seeing how really he made a part of the history of his time, and how truly his biography is the record of that history. . . . Mr. Hill's daughters and biographers habitually assisted him—as we know, though they nowhere mention it—in his great and uninterrmitting work; . . . and the masterly way in which they have given the whole story of each social movement down to the present time, and not merely their father's share in it, shows that their filial services were of a more intelligent and sympathetic character than those by which Milton's daughters lightened his labours. . . . We cannot, indeed, praise too highly the execution of this worthy memorial of a worthy father."—Spectator, lii. 763.

Hilton, James, F.S.A. 1. Chronograms, Five Thousand and More in Number, excerpted out of Various Authors and collected in Many Places, Lon., 1882, 4to.

"That any one could be found to make the history and collection of chronograms his hobby is sufficiently surprising, but surprise gives way to some extent to admiration when the reader finds that Mr. Hilton's enthusiasm has resulted in the publication of a most tastefully printed antique quarto of 570 pages, containing a collection of 5137 examples of chronograms culled from various languages and countries, ranging from A.D. 1208 to the present time." —Ath., No. 2868.

2. Chronograms Continued and Concluded, Lon., 1885, 4to.

"Full of out-of-the-way information, conducting the reader into many an unfrequented by-path of history, valuable as a chronicle of extraordinary human ingenuity."—Ath., No. 3029.

"The views of Mr. Hilton may be fairly taken to represent those of a school which has done very much of late years to make medicine and surgery something better than a mystery and an art, and to place them among the most noble of the applied sciences. . . . The means which he has taken to work out his purpose tell of a deep-rooted faith that Nature gave us at once, and in the same frame, a perfect machinery for the purposes of life and for the reparation of mischief caused by injury or disease."—*Sat. Hinton, James, M.R.C.S., 1822–1875, b. at Reading, Eng.; son of Rev. John Howard Hinton, infra; was educated at private schools, and in 1838 was apprenticed to a clothier in London; a year later he entered an insurance office, but gave up that situation in consequence of a decline of health; entered St. Bartholomew's Hospital to study medicine, and became a member of the Royal College of Surgeons in 1847. In 1848 he went as surgeon of a ship from Sierra Leone to Jamaica, where he remained for two years, afterwards visiting the United States. In 1850 he began medical practice in London, and gradually confined himself to aural surgery, in which he gained large practice and reputation. He was lecturer on aural surgery at Guy's Hospital from 1863 to 1874, when he gave up his profession to devote himself to philosophical studies. For biog., see HOPKINS, JANE ELLICE, infra. 1. "Mr. Hinton was apparently too much in earnest to be critical; we should say, though it may sound paradoxical, too much in earnest to walk safely in philosophical inquiries. The satisfaction he went forth in search of was moral, not intellectual. Disinterested even to excess in one sense, his habit of mind was over-weighted with a special interest in another. His writing shows hardly a trace of the pure curiosity of speculation, and little, if anything, of delight in dialectics as a fine art. Least of all does he seem to think of forcing conviction on the reader. His essays are in very truth what many things written for effect have professed to be,—solitary meditations."—Sat. Rev., xlvii 279.

"One's first reflection on reading these short stimulating papers, which are like so many beams of light glancing here and there on widely-removed objects and everywhere illuminating and beautifying with their touch, is that here is an intellect which ought to be one of the great stirring forces in contemporary thought. . . . A man who so frankly avows that he seeks to satisfy at once our intellects and our emotions is best viewed perhaps as a kind of poet."—JAMES SULLY: Acad., xv. 500.

11. Philosophy and Religion: Selections from the Manuscripts of the Late James Hinton. Edited by Caroline Haddon. Lon., 1881, 8vo. (The selections are from the earlier series of MSS., belonging to the period from 1856 to about 1861.)

"This is a valuable book; philosophically speaking, perhaps the most valuable book written in England since Coleridge. First, for the deep insight of the thoughts which compose its philosophy of 'Actualism;' and secondly, on account of the particular philosophical ground which it occupies, and from which it speaks."—SHADWORTH H. HODGSON: Acad., xxi. 29.

12. The Law-Breaker and the Coming of the Law. Edited by M. Hinton. Lon., 1884, p. 8vo.

"The position of 'The Law-Breaker' is briefly that laws, duties, virtues, fixed rights and wrongs, are apt to become obsolete, dead, and mischievous, and that it is a pernicious mistake to regard them as of permanent obligation; since, as circumstances change, duties change also for individuals; there is no absolute morality binding on all and forever."—Acad., xxvi. 395.

GENERAL CRITICISM:

"He was a born metaphysician, and the 'art of thinking' was to him what music was to Beethoven or dramatic dialogue to Shakespere. But he was no mere thinker in the ordinary sense of the word. He was rather . . . a prophet, a seer. His thinking was a spiritual, not an intellectual, process; and the visions he saw revolved round the profoundest themes,—God, life, man, and above all, combining and concentrating them all, the great world-tragedy of woman."—JAMES A. ALDIS: Acad., xxx. 1.

There is loss as well as gain in this arrangement. . . . We see here Lord Shaftesbury as he knew himself, with his powers and failings as he conceived them; . . . we catch but indirect glimpses of the real impression which he made on the men who were nearest him in authority and ability, and learn still less of the spirit and teaching of that age through which he moved in a manner so conspicuous."—Ath., No. 3083.

Hodgetts, J. Frederick. 1. Older England: Illustrated by the Anglo-Saxon Antiquities in the British Museum, Lon., 1884, two series, 8vo.

"The book consists of a collection of six lectures delivered by the author in the Anglo-Saxon Room of the British Museum, and a most interesting book it is, full of out-of-the-way learning and of facts which it behooves all who love this English land, and are curious about the beginnings of its history, to know. Mr. Ruskin, who was one of the select few who listened to these lectures, said that they were a new revelation of truth and poetry for him; that he had no idea of the wealth and beauty of ancient English teachings until he heard them from Mr. Hodgetts' lips; that the latter had overturned some of his most cherished opinions, but had given him a new field of thought instead."—Spectator, lvii. 448.

"Eccentric speculations are made the text for moralizing discourses, which together take up the greater part of the volume. We should be glad if we could assent to the high praise which the author quotes from Prof. Ruskin and other eminent persons who were among his hearers; but the fact that such praise could be given only shows how greatly the educated public stands in need of enlightenment respecting 'Older England.'"—Acad., xxv. 201.

The honorary degree of D.C.L. was conferred upon him by the University of Durham in 1883, and by the University of Oxford in 1886. He has contributed to the Edinburgh Review and other periodicals, and to the ninth edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica. 1. Claudian: the Last of the Roman Poets: Two Lectures delivered before the Literary and Philosophical Society, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Newcastle and Lon., 1875, p. 8vo.

"More able and appreciative treatment than that which Mr. Hodgkin gives to his subject could not be desired."—Spectator, xlviii. 1149.

2. Italy and her Invaders: vols. i., ii., 376–476, Oxf., 1880, 8vo.

"The idea of the book is to describe the process by which the old government and civilization of Italy were destroyed, and the foundations laid for the new development of her mediæval life. . . . The conception is a fine one, worthy of the long and serious study which Mr. Hodgkin has evidently given it . . . He has been driven to depart pretty widely from his original scheme, and has really given us not so much a history of Italy and the Teutonic nations that invaded her as a series of pictures from the fourth and fifth centuries. . . . The book is one of great and uncommon merits. . . . There is a freshness and heartiness about it which makes it pleasant reading from the first page to the last. The author has lived so long among the men of whom he writes that they have become quite real and living to him, and his interest communicates itself to his readers. . . . His style is always simple, lively, graphic; and if his treatment, and the occasional reflections or illustrations which he throws in, become occasionally somewhat more familiar than the last generation would have thought compatible with the dignity of history, this is, after all, an error on the right side, an error which one is disposed to praise when the subject is so remote and little known that a dry and pragmatic handling of it is more than usually certain to repel most people. . . . It is long since we have come across a book more likely to make history popular by true and honest methods."—Sat. Rev., l. 211.

Vols. iii. and iv., The Ostrogothic Invasion; the Imperial Restoration, 1885.

"Mr. Hodgkin has a story to tell which is in all ways one of the most fascinating which history affords. . . . He has an excellent author to expound in Procopius, 'De Bello Gothico,' and he spares no pains to extract his author's meaning. Mr. Hodgkin has clearly rambled, with his Procopius in his hand, along the whole line of the march of Belisarius. He has identified all the places which Procopius mentions; he has examined every battle-field. . . . His account of the glories of ancient Rome is the most vivid and the most intelligible that we have ever read. Not only does he reproduce the Forum and the Capitol, but the walls, the gates, and the aqueducts are made the subjects of animated description."—Sat. Rev., lx. 579.

"His standard of historical performance has steadily risen as he has gone forward with his task; he has learnt how to mass and group his subject, how to handle his materials to the best advantage, and how to restrain some of that tendency to rash analogy and picturesque comparison which is one of the greatest snares of the historian. . . . The book . . . has not quite the grip of the great historians, but Mr. Hodgkin has industry, imagination, and an attractive style."—Ath., No. 3024.

"They tell once more those stories the centres of which are Theodoric and Totila, Belisarius and Narses, and than these the history of the world presents none more romantic. . . . Mr. Hodgkin's style is admirably suited to do justice to his present narrative." – Spectator, lix. 17.

3. The Letters of Cassiodorus: being a Condensed Translation of the Variæ Epistolæ of Magnus Aurelius Cassiodorus, Senator: with an Introduction, Lon., 1886, 8vo.

"An excellent contribution to the interpretation of an author whose historical value is out of all proportion to his very limited degree of literary merit."—Ath., No. 3068.

"The work is, of course, one which appeals more to the student than to the general reader; but whilst no one interested in Tibet and Nepaul should be without Mr. Hodgson's 'Essays,' any casual reader who may turn to the second part of his volume will find general information conveyed in a pleasant style."—Ath., No. 2454.

2. Miscellaneous Essays relating to Indian Subjects, Lon., 1880, 2 vols. 8vo.

"Every chapter relates more or less to philological subjects and to philological studies; and many of them are abstruse essays, or most valuable critical contributions to the comparative philology or the comparative grammar of some of the least known of the Oriental languages."—Spectator, liv. 289.

"This is a remarkable volume of the collective essays of a remarkable man, who in green old age is still among us, though some of his writings date back to a period when men of sixty were still boys at school; and these Essays register the high-water mark of a particular branch of linguistic knowledge which up to this date has never been exceeded."—ROBERT CUST: Acad., xvii. 367.

He has, in a word, treated the art-student as a being who thinks before he paints, and wishes to learn the history of his profession, and to profit by the warnings of centuries. Such enlightenment as may be gained by a thorough mastery of these lectures has probably never been so easily attainable by any art-student in any age."—COSMO MONKHOUSE: Acad., xxvi. 111.

"Four years ago, at the entreaty of his children, he wrote down for them the story of his life, as he could then recall it, and printed it for a small private circle of his friends. In his eighty-fourth year he is induced to give it a wider range and publishes it for the world. It is singularly open in its confidences, and wins upon us like a personal narrative which we listen to from an old man's lips."—Ath., No. 2306.

Holmes, Oliver Wendell, M.D., [ante, vol. i., add.,] resigned his professorship in the medical school at Harvard in 1882, and was appointed professor emeritus. In 1886 he paid a visit to England, meeting with a reception that testified to his popularity with readers of every class. His literary activity has diminished under the weight of fourscore years, but he still contributes occasionally to the Atlantic Monthly, and his later productions, whether in prose or verse, have shown little diminution of the exuberant fancy and wit and felicitous expression in which he is generally acknowledged to have no rival among American poets and essayists. "When he had written the 'Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table,' Dr. Holmes would have done well, as it has since appeared, had he ceased from satire. That series of papers gave him a brilliant reputation, which from that time forward he has gone on damaging, diminishing it by each new book. . . . On the whole, 'The Guardian Angel' is far from being unreadable, unless one is too fastidious."—Nation, v. 390.

9. Mechanism in Thought and Morals: an Address delivered before the Phi Beta Kappa Society of Harvard University, June 29, 1870: with Notes and Afterthoughts, Bost., 1870, 16mo.

"Dr. Holmes's position is substantially Huxley's, that man is a machine,—only a machine which is partly self-regulated; or Du Bois-Reymond's, that, were it not for the difficulties of dissection, all the processes that go on in living beings, up to the problem of personal freedom, would be a matter of analytical mechanics."—Nation, xii. 145.

10. The Poet at the Breakfast-Table, Bost., 1872, 12mo.

"The vein which Dr. Holmes has worked so long gives no signs of exhaustion. Whether he has brought to light as much sterling ore as on former occasions need not be decided; but at any rate he writes with his old buoyancy, and does not make upon us the unpleasant impression as of a writer flogging a tired horse and producing a wretched jog-trot in place of the old lively paces."—*Sat. "Viewing the book merely as a memoir, the reader is disappointed; but taking it for what it is, a detailed review of the opera omnia of one man of genius by another, with running annotations, grave, gay, learned, and witty, it becomes both valuable and attractive."—Nation, xl. 99.

19. Before the Curfew, and other Poems, chiefly Occasional, Bost., 1888, 16mo.

"Dr. Holmes is, of all living American writers, the one who may most truly be said to have won the hearts of English readers. Longfellow and Emerson, who have so lately passed away, have had, the former wider, and the latter deeper, influence on the feelings and thoughts of Englishmen. But there is no American author now living whose works are more often read, and (which is the best test of their value) more often taken up again, than those of Dr. Holmes."—Sat. Rev., lvii. 651.

Holmes, Oliver Wendell, son of the preceding, b. 1841, in Boston; educated at Harvard College; served in the civil war; admitted to the bar 1866; elected a professor in the law school of Harvard 1882, and in the same year appointed a justice of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts. The Common Law, Bost., 1881, 8vo.

"It can best be described as an historical essay describing the influence of the primitive conceptions of the childhood of the Teutonic races upon the common law of to-day. . . . The volume contains much that is novel and brilliant, and . . . it shows calm consideration and unusually profound legal study. . . . It is injured by long philosophical discussions of intent and the like, which . . . give a tediously discursive and aimless air to the book, and hide its real historical value."—Nation, xxxii. 464.

"A history which, though not likely to remain an authority, has at least done something towards digesting the vast literature of the Mutiny."—Spectator, lvii. 1110.

"The object of Mr. Holmes is to supplement the works of Kaye and Malleson, and to complete 'the solution of the real historical problems connected with the Mutiny.' In this attempt Mr. Holmes has been successful. He has thrown new light on many debated subjects, he has led the reader through a maze of events, and he has shown with much exactitude the precise relation of each part of the drama to the whole."—Ath., No. 2957.

(The author writes, "I have given to this lecture this title, because words are lamps, are pitchers, and are trumpets. Preaching to the intellect . . . is as a lamp; . . . preaching to the conscience is as a trumpet; . . . preaching to the experience is as a pitcher.")

Advance and Retreat: Personal Experiences in the United States and Confederate States Armies. Edited by General Beauregard. N. Orleans, 1880, 8vo.

"It was evidently begun as an answer to the strictures on General Hood's campaign of 1864 in Georgia and Tennessee which General Joseph E. Johnston had made in his 'Narrative,' and probably grew into larger proportions than the author had first intended. . . . He vehemently insists that he deserved victory, if he did not achieve it. . . . His book must be judged for what it is,—a very sincere but controversial defence of his policy as an army commander, and not as a systematic contribution to exact history. It will have a permanent value of its own, and will (as we think it should) modify favorably the judgment of the world upon his last important campaign."—Nation, xxx. 236, 254.

"There are historians more capable than Dr. Hook of dressing up a pretty picture, of trotting out a novelty in a taking shape. . . . But we believe that there is none who has written history or biography with a more single eye to the main object of historical and biographical writing, the setting forth of truth."—*Sat. "It is painful to be obliged to say that the book is not only unworthy of Dean Hook's well-earned reputation, but that it is almost entirely destitute of any historical or biographical value. It is full of mistakes, small and great, full of random accusations against persons and parties, which no attempt is made to substantiate."—SAMUEL R. Hookham, Mrs. Mary Ann. The Life and Times of Margaret of Anjou, Queen of England and of France; and of her Father, René "the Good," King of Sicily, Naples, and Jerusalem: with Memoirs of the House of Anjou, Lon., 1872, 2 vols. 8vo.

"She is just a little too indiscriminate in her admiration; and, while she evidently means to do them justice, she often really waters down the characters of those whom she describes by terms of undistinguishing eulogy. . . . Mrs. Hookham has collected her materials with considerable assiduity; but she would have added greatly to their value had she but shown some critical discernment worthy of so much industry. . . . Few biographies, however, are more interesting than those of René and Margaret of Anjou, and Mrs. Hookham has made a readable book by merely telling the story of these two remarkable lives together."—Ath., No. 2320.

"James Hinton's biography has fallen into good hands. Miss Ellice Hopkins was Hinton's personal friend, and was able, by virtue of thorough congeniality of disposition, to know what he knew, to feel what he felt, to get exactly into his point of view, and to act as interpreter between him and the world. . . . She writes well,—not only clearly, but with an eloquence which sometimes rises almost into poetry. . . . Sir William Gull also was the right man to supply the 'Introduction' to James Hinton's biography. The life and letters are an illustrative and corroborative comment upon Sir William's estimate of his friend. The book is full of interest, and by no means void of instruction."—Spectator, li. 444.

"The travel and experiences recounted in these pages were undertaken for the purpose of obtaining the skins and skeletons of rare animals for Mr. Ward. The record is rather of action than of observation, of pursuit and capture rather than of study, of sturdy delights of the energetic hunter rather than the rapture of the biologist in a strange and novel fauna. . . . The most important parts of the book are those relating to gavial-shooting on the Jumna, to the long and finally successful chase for wild elephants, and to orang-hunting in Borneo."—Nation, xli. 308.

"It is written with great care, with all due study of documents, and there is often a good deal of ingenuity in its particular arguments and objections. But, as it seems to be fighting alongside of Mr. Froude, we must set forth our conviction that Mr. Froude was on the whole as much the better of Mr. Hosack in force of argument as he certainly was in power of narrative."—*Sat. "Mr. Hosack's former volumes . . . required supplementing by a popular work, which should present the facts of the case in the shortest and clearest form possible. On this Mr. Hosack was engaged when he died. . . . Though the book is imperfect, all those parts are complete which deal with the graver charges which affect the minds of the men of our generation. In our opinion Mr. Hosack has thoroughly proved his case."—Edward Peacock: Acad., xxxiv. 129.

"Mr. Howell's book . . . is in substance and in tone an apologetic work written to vindicate the Trade Unions from the unfavourable criticisms of outsiders, and especially of political economists. Few persons possess greater qualifications for the task which he has set himself than the author, and we may say at once that, notwithstanding an occasional asperity, . . . the subject is treated throughout in a spirit of fairness and moderation for which we were much less prepared than for the ability of the reasoning and the vigour of the style."—Spectator, li. 861.

Howells, Miss Annie T. Popular Sayings. By Aitiaiche. 1877.

Howells, William Dean, b. 1837, at Martin's Ferry, O.; was educated, according to his own statement, in a printing-office, having learned as a child to set type in the office of the Hamilton (O.) Intelligencer, of which his father was proprietor, and writing verses which he printed himself in the newspaper office. He afterwards became a journalist in Columbus, O., and while residing there contributed poems to the Atlantic Monthly, and published a volume of verse in conjunction with J. J. Piatt, (q. v., ante, vol. ii.) In 1861 he was appointed U.S. consul to Venice, where he resided till 1865, gaining an intimate knowledge of the Italian language and literature. On returning to the United States he was for some time an editorial writer on the New York Tribune and a salaried contributor to the Nation. In 1866 he became assistant editor of the Atlantic Monthly, and from 1872 to 1881 was its editor, resigning that position in the latter year to gain more time for original writing. Since 1886 he has contributed exclusively to Harper's Monthly, where he has charge of a critical department called "The Editor's Study," in which he expounds and develops the literary convictions that underlie all his later work in fiction.

1. Life of Abraham Lincoln, 1860.

2. Venetian Life, N. York, 1866, 16mo; new ed., enl., 1880.

"Mr. Howells has not only the best qualities of a pleasant travelling companion, but those also which are most desirable in the traveller who recounts his story. . . . Mr. Howells possesses, besides the good qualities we have already mentioned, the penetrative insight of a poetic temperament, together with good common sense and sound moral feeling. His book reminds the reader of Hawthorne's 'Our Old Home,' for, in its degree, it does for Venice what that delightful work of the rarest genius accomplished for England,—presents a picture of it as it appears to an American of the present day whose nature is receptive of true impressions of the external and material aspects of life, and not less of their internal and spiritual significance."—Nation, iii. 189.

3. Italian Journeys, N. York, 1867, 12mo; new ed., enl., 1880.

"The reader makes pilgrimage in Mr. Howells's company to Padua and Ferrara and Genoa and Naples, . . . and many places more, all of which are treated with a sort of loving disparagement which belongs partly to Mr. Howells in Italy and, if we may so speak, partly to the nineteenth century in Italy. . . . He overflows with pure fun and humor of a delightfully quiet sort. . . . From the beginning to the end it is a proof that in Mr. Howells we have a new writer with a peculiar gift of value sufficient to insure him a place by himself, and a very honorable place, in American literature—in English literature."—Nation, vi. 11.

"For the unalloyed pureness of this essentially humoristic disposition,—the disposition which plays with the world, . . . it would be hard to find anywhere in the annals of our literature a humorist, however great, who would not, we should say, give Mr. Howells most cordial welcome to his company, and who would not admit him to be of the true strain."—Nation, xii. 44.

7. Poems, Bost., 1873, 12mo.

"The style in general . . . seems to be not altogether equal to that of his prose. . . . Of the more important qualities which shine in our author's prose works—as, for instance, of the easy humor, sometimes slyly keen and sometimes poetical and delicate, which doubtless is his strongest point—there are here plenty of specimens."—Nation, xvii. 310.

8. A Chance Acquaintance. Illust. Bost., 1874, 18mo.

9. A Foregone Conclusion, Bost., 1875, 12mo.

"Slight as it is in apparent composition, the four figures of which it consists are all conceived with unquestionable originality and drawn with very great skill."—G. SAINTSBURY: Acad., vii. 264.

"He has given himself a narrow stage, or rather a scanty dramatis personæ, (for he has all glowing Venice for a back scene,) and he has attempted to depict but a single situation. But between his four persons the drama is complete and the interest acute. It is all a most remarkable piece of elaboration. Mr. Howells has already proved that he lacked nothing that art can give in the way of finish and ingenuity of manner; but he has now proved that he can embrace a dramatic situation with the true imaginative force,—give us not only its mechanical structure, but its atmosphere, its meaning, its poetry."—Nation, xx. 12.

16. The Lady of the Aroostook, Bost., 1879, 12mo.

"He has described with the accuracy almost of self-consciousness a type of the girl whom our New England village life produces. Our modern inherited Puritanism has not found so fine an illustration before. . . . Mr. Howells has made himself acquainted with this character, and has realized it with the faithfulness of portraiture, just as he has succeeded equally well in the easier task of painting to the life the good, stupid Dunham, commonplace Staniford, and the Venetian aunt. . . . It is less strong as a whole than in its details. The charm of it is not in its very subdued incident and plot, but to a considerable extent in its minute felicities, in half-sentences, half-lines, sometimes in single words and the turn of a phrase, in the attitudes, movements, and belongings, rather than in the theme itself."—Nation, xxviii. 205.

17. The Undiscovered Country, Bost., 1880, 12mo.

"Those who read him with the sincerest pleasure will, we are convinced, lament the misconception of his real strength implied in the abandonment of a field in which he has been so successful for more serious and 'important' works."—Nation, xxxi 49.

18. A Fearful Responsibility, and other Stories, Bost., 1881, 12mo.

"The first third of the book is rather flat and discursive, . . . and the marionette dance of the very real personages is too long postponed; but after Mr. Howells begins to pull the strings in earnest—if we may use this adjective—the spectacle becomes an entertainment of the first class."—Nation, xxxiii. 54.

19. Doctor Breen's Practice: a Novel, Bost., 1881, 12mo.

"A novel of New England life, in which Mr. Howells shows his usual skill and humor, and more than an ordinary amount of ingenuity as well."—Nation, xxxiv. 18.

"The dialogue is throughout so good, the characters, minor as well as principal, so ably sketched, and the slight plot so well guided and developed, that pages of quotation would be necessary, were we to . . . try to give any fair idea of the quiet satire that runs through the volume."—Spectator, lv. 665.

20. A Modern Instance, Bost., 1882, 12mo.

"A very striking novel, which every one praises for its life-like fidelity to nature, and no one seems to like thoroughly. . . . Without attempting to analyze the causes which give the novel its disagreeable flavor,—though we suggest that it is perhaps owing to the fact that every reader, however good or refined, feels in himself or herself a resemblance to some one of the common American types with which it is filled,—we shall simply say that as a work of moral fiction 'A Modern Instance' is unequalled."—Nation, xxxvi. 41.

21. The Sleeping-Car: a Farce, Bost., 1883, 32mo.

22. A Woman's Reason, Bost., 1883, 12mo.

"It is not so striking a tale as 'A Modern Instance,' though it is in many respects pleasanter reading. It suggests the Woman question, and, like many other novels which have dealt with this knotty question, leaves it unsolved. . . . The book is full of nice touches."—Nation, xxxvii. 419.

26. The Rise of Silas Lapham, Bost., 1885, 12mo.

"In 'The Rise of Silas Lapham' Mr. Howells depicts one character distinctively of his time, aggressively of his nation, with a vividness and completeness unapproached in contemporary English fiction, apparently unapproachable by any contemporary writer in the English tongue. . . . With the representation is blended a searching and comprehensive interpretation. Directing and perfecting both is the quick, subtle, mocking spirit of the author, flashing in a phrase or comparison, gleaming in a jest at the sober unconsciousness of the subject who provides the opportunity. From the cleverness of Lapham as literary work it is as impossible to detract as it is to dispute the antipathy his personality excites in people of good taste, or to deny his practical virtues. His almost unmitigated offensiveness is a large part of his truth. . . . Except in literary form, it has, of course, no beauty. And it is in this studied ignoring of beauty, this expenditure of power on the essentially unbeautiful, that the Realist of the passionless every-day falls short of high or good art. There is no inspiration for any one in the character of Silas Lapham. It rouses no tender or elevating emotion, stirs no thrill of sympathy, suggests no ideal of conduct, no notion that the world at large is or can be less ugly than Lapham and his paint. If it is to be conceded that Mr. Howells and his school are great artists in the highest reaches of their art, then the language is in sore need of words to define Sir Walter Scott and Thackeray."—Nation, xli. 347.

"A novel which no one can neglect who cares to understand American character. Any one who wishes to gain an insight into the conditions of life in America, and to peer into social complexions, cannot do better than to give his days and nights to the study of Mr. Howells's stories in general and of 'The Rise of Silas Lapham' in particular. America and the average American of to-day are not to be found in the picturesque pages of Mr. Bret Harte or of Mr. George W. Cable, any more than they are to be sought in the 'Biglow Papers,' or in Mark Twain's joyful pages, or in the very clever tales of Mr. Henry James. They are here—in the pages of Mr. Howells—as they are to be found nowhere else, except in real life. Mr. Howells has seen and he has understood and he has recorded, and his record is true. . . . The humour of Mr. Howells's story is quite as remarkable as its truth."—Sat. Rev., lx. 517.

27. Tuscan Cities: with Illustrations from Drawings and Etchings by Joseph Pennell and Others, Bost., 1885, 12mo.

"These two reservations one is forced to make, on final consideration: one is dissatisfied with the lack of discrimination [in the choice of subjects] and with a too exclusive novelty. . . . When the author leaves his note-books and breathes the air of the Italy that is dear to him, we are at once transported by his imagination. There are many Italys; each traveller makes one for himself, and that of Mr. Howells is a very charming one, full of passive enjoyments of nature and human nature as they are, and faintly touched with the sentiment of the past. . . . His Italy is not the scholar's or the poet's, but the modern tourist's, of however high degree."—Nation, xli. 410.

28. The Elevator: Farce, Bost., 1885, 16mo.

29. Indian Summer, Bost., 1885, 12mo.

"Mr. Howells always chooses to avoid drama and deep feeling; he has a right to select, but the novelist who persistently ignores both or mocks at both is as false to life in a broad way as the novelist who is always in hysterics. In 'Indian Summer' he has expended his skill on trifles exclusively."—Nation, xlii 407.

"The interweaving of plan and counterplan, the continual by-play in the minds of people feeling a good deal, but possessed of the grace not to tell all they feel, makes the little plot really intricate and full to the brim of human interest."—Critic, v. 154.

30. The Minister's Charge; or, The Apprenticeship of Lemuel Barker, Bost., 1887, 12mo.

"In this novel, as in 'A Modern Instance' and 'Silas Lapham,' he shows himself a masterly realist, laboring under obvious restrictions in his selection and view of character. . . . From Mr. Howells's later works, the inference is justifiable that he desires impartially and fearlessly to record New England life both in its broad tendencies and its detail. So far he has shown us that there is little variety in the people,—that their prominent characteristics are of a mean order and strikingly disagreeable."—Nation, xliv. 124.

"There is nothing anywhere in the book that is not realistic, but the first half,—that which deals with Lemuel's mild aspirations and keen disappointments, his first experiences in city life, his delusions and his awakening and his falling back into apathy,—all this is touched with sympathy, the sympathy which means insight as well as photography, the sympathy which creates the kind of imagination that simply sees behind a veil and describes things that are real though invisible to the average man."—Critic, vii. 63.

31. Modern Italian Poets: Essays and Venetian Portraits, 1887, 12mo. (Contains sketches of eighteen authors, from 1770 to 1870.)

"It would probably be difficult to find, either in Italy or in England, in one little volume eminently readable, so much accurate and easy information about the national life of Italy from Napoleon to Cavour."—Ath., No. 3145.

"If the modern period is to be treated as something absolutely disconnected from the earlier age, no one could do it more felicitously than Mr. Howells. . . . He has this sure merit, that he makes his book attractive; and his ventures into the field of translation have a peculiar charm."—Nation, xlvi. 18.

32. April Hopes, Bost., 1887, 12mo.

"The pleasure it gives is almost entirely dependent on the possession by the reader of what may be called the literary sense. That sense is deeply gratified by the irony so delicate that its frequent ill nature is condoned by the accurate expression of habits of manner and speech, of secret thought, and even of the haziest intellectual perception. The gain to fiction from the author's allegiance to that division of literature is not so great as the loss to metaphysics. All his exceptional qualities, not excluding his wit, would shine more brilliantly in abstract exposition. . . . If human beings were nothing but machines for ever rattling off superficially cynical frivolities, Mr. Howells could draw them with absolute perfection."—Nation, xlvi. 142.

"Doubtless the scenes are common and the incidents trifling, but they are the subjects of a subtle, exquisite, refined interpretation."—Literary World, xix. 20.

33. Annie Kilburn: a Novel, N. York, 1888, 12mo.

34. A Sea Change; or, Love's Stowaway: a Lyrical Farce, in Two Acts and an Epilogue, Bost., 1888, 24mo.

With Perry, Thomas Sergeant, (ed.) Library of Universal Adventure by Sea and Land: including Original Narratives and Authentic Stories of Personal Prowess and Peril in All the Waters and Regions of the Globe from the Year 79 to 1888. Illust. N. York, 1887, 8vo.

General Criticism:

"As an observer of his fellow-creatures Mr. Howells stands very high; as a student of the great enigma—woman—he is quite unrivalled."—Acad., xxiv. 327.

"In the work of Mr. W. D. Howells no thoughtful reader can have failed to observe a continuous deepening and widening of human interest. It may be said that the order of development in his prose is not unlike the order of development in Lord Tennyson's verse. Both the American novelist and the English poet were artists from the first; but at first neither was anything more than an artist: the gift of finished graceful expression preceded the acquisition of anything very substantial to express. . . . The latest books of Mr. Howells have in them recognizable flesh and blood; his people do not elude us, as was their wont in the old days; we know them, and can, as it were, grasp their hands. He has, moreover, developed a remarkable gift of enabling us to see and realize the individual person not merely as an individual, but as a member of society. In spite of his attention to detail,—to what often seems even triviality of detail,—he is often singularly successful in his suggestion of moral, intellectual, and emotional atmosphere."—Spectator, lxii. 371.

"He has many admirable qualities, not the least of which is that he draws from models and not 'out of his own head;' the result is that his people, whether we like them or not, have always the great merit of absolute reality. Next, he is true to his characters; they go whither they are bound to go, up or down, taking the natural consequences of their actions and their lives. This recognition by writers of Necessity or Consequence in fiction is almost as rare as its perception by ordinary people in real life. If we add that he is the possessor of a style which is always pleasing and unstudied, though certainly the result of study, we have already assigned him qualities which insure success. He has certain defects; he lacks gaité de cœur, the natural liveliness which goes far to redeem almost every other fault. Yet he is not cynical; if he does not laugh much, he never sneers; his stories have no plot, no situations to speak of, and not many incidents, yet they interest; his conversations are sometimes flippant and sometimes in bad taste, yet they are natural."—*Sat. Hueffer, Franz, (or Francis,) Ph.D., 1845–1889, b. at Münster, Germany; removed to England in 1869, and established himself as a musical critic, in which capacity he succeeded J. W. Davison on the Times in 1878, and was the first to advocate Wagner's music in England. He contributed to periodicals, wrote the librettos of two operas by A. C. Mackenzie, and edited a series of biographies entitled "The Great Musicians." 1. Richard Wagner and the Music of the Future: History and Æsthetics, Lon., 1874, p. 8vo.

"Dr. Hüffer treats of Wagner as representing the dramatic, and Schubert, Schumann, Franz, and Liszt as illustrating the various shades of the lyrical, phase of modern music. . . . Though it contains several things with which we have been conscientiously compelled to differ, it is nevertheless a valuable addition to our musical literature."—EBENEZER PROUT: Acad., v. 439.

"His knowledge of the subject appears to have become even rusty, if one may judge by the quantity of inaccuracies which are to be found in this volume."—Ath., No. 2646.

"In spite of all the innate popularity of the theme, and its importance in the history of culture, no trustworthy volume on the Troubadours has hitherto been published in England. It is not needful to give the name of a very worthless book that essayed to fill this gap a few years ago; slightly better than this was a later American publication, by Miss Harriet Preston. Both are entirely superseded by the work now under review, by a scholar who has done thoroughly good work in the same line before, and whose critical edition of the works of Guillem de Cabestanh is enough to prove his competence and learning."—Spectator, li. 736.

"The staple of the Letters is made up of purely family matters, . . . varied chiefly by lively and slightly mischievous descriptions of le prochain. It is in this last particular that the main interest and the main value of the letters lie. They contain, if the phrase may be permitted, the matter of the novels in solution—in a very diluted and not always a very unmixed solution—but still there. . . . The fault of the book simply is that it puts before the reader, in a not over-well edited form, a great deal of matter which is simply trivial."—Sat. Rev., lviii. 637.

Hughes, Thomas, F.S.A., Q.C., b. 1823, at Uppingtou, Berkshire; educated at Rugby, under Dr. Arnold, and at Oriel College, Oxford, where he graduated 1845; called to the bar at the Inner Temple 1848; M.P. for Lambeth 1865–68, and for Frome 1868–71; judge of county courts since 1882. He was associated with Charles Kingsley and F. D. Maurice in the movement for the improvement of the condition of the London poor which was known as "Christian Socialism." In 1870 he visited the United States and delivered lectures, and in 1880 he founded the "Rugby Colony" in Tennessee. 1. Tom Brown's School Days. By an Old Boy. Cambridge, 1857, p. 8vo; 2d ed. same year; several later eds.

"The book is a thoroughly English book, heartily acquiescing in English ways and tastes, especially in the English system of public school education. . . . Whether the system be perfect or not the 'Old Boy' does not trouble himself to inquire. He takes it as he finds it. He neither apologizes for it nor tries to idealize it. . . . Many a boy, who has been allured from page to page by the racy school adventures of Tom Brown, will pause, sobered and softened, over the really noble pathos of the last chapter, in which Tom Brown, now an Oxford man, discovers all that Arnold has been to him, but discovers it above his grave."—*Sat. Cambridge, 1861. 3 vols. p. 8vo.

"The book is not only a failure, but is evidently written by an author who knew that it was a failure. . . . There are many passages in the description of Oxford which are excellent. . . . They are life-like, and, without an affectation of over-accuracy, are, in substance, very effective representations of the thing to be described. . . . But there are many subjects into which the career of his hero takes Mr. Hughes for which he has no forte, about which he does not trouble himself, and through which he drifts in a hopeless, aimless way, which is very trying to his readers."—*Sat. "Such a work as this has been long needed, and it would be hard to find any one better qualified to prepare it than Mr. Hughes. . . . His usual method is to begin an article with the texts in the Koran relating to the subject, then to add the traditions bearing upon it, and to conclude with the comments of the Mohammedan scholiasts and the criticisms of Western scholars. . . . There is something on nearly every page of the 'Dictionary' that will interest and instruct the student of Eastern (and predominantly Indian) religion, manners, and customs."—Ath., No. 3047.

"It describes the geography of its history as it proceeds, but . . . it is too general, and, in battles for instance, it is rather that of the locality than of the battle. . . . But the principal defect of his book is, that it is not contemporaneous and successive, but breaks up British history, as it were, into cubes. . . . "A repository of data of the greatest value. The narrative is very clear, concise, and fair in spirit. It is too crowded, and written too much, perhaps, in the style of an official report, to be entertaining to the casual reader; but its interest to the student of the great campaign of 1864-65 can hardly be exaggerated."—Nation, xxxvi. 532.

Religious Thought in England, from the Reformation to the End of the Last Century: a Contribution to the History of Theology, 1870–73, 3 vols. 8vo.

"In 1859 I began a course of reading with the object of inquiring into the nature of revelation and the evidences by which it is supported. At the end of four years I had formed a plan of something like a complete history of theology, which would set forth the special character of Christianity and its relation to other religions. In the spring of 1863 I showed the outlines of my work to the late Professor Maurice, who had gone over large portions of the same field, and whose writings had been of great service to me. The professor looked over the paper, and, returning it, said, with an incredulous smile, 'You have twenty years' work before you.' He advised me to try one part first, and to go on with the rest if that succeeded. I took his advice, and in 1866 the first chapter, which was on Pantheism, had become a large volume. Ten years have passed since that conversation with Professor Maurice. The present work is only the completion of the second chapter, and the first will have to be rewritten."—Extract from the Author's Preface.

"Who does not, or at least should not, feel grateful to the laborious author who gives us, in a series of successive, brief statements, the results of long and careful processes of inquiry, involving an amount of toil which he alone knows the extent of? Of such careful work the book before us gives ample proof; and, what is at least as important, it is the work of a man of judicial mind."—Spectator, xlviii. 600.

The Encyclopædic Dictionary: a New and Original Work of Reference to All the Words in the English Language: with a Full Account of their Origin, Meaning, Pronunciation, and Use. Illust. Lon., 1879–88, 7 vols. r. 8vo. (Dr. Hunter, whose name does not appear on the title-page as it has since been printed, collected the material which served as the original basis of the work, and contributed a large majority of the articles which are distinctly of an encyclopædic character, the general editor being Mr. John Williams, of the literary staff of Cassell & Co.)

"The publishers tell us that they have felt the 'need of a work' combining 'the ordinary features of a dictionary' of English and the treatment of 'certain subjects with something of the exhaustiveness adopted in an encyclopædia.' . . . It must be confessed that, on the encyclopædic side, Mr. Hunter has (without being exhaustive) brought together a mass of useful information on a variety of subjects. . . . A valuable feature, in which Mr. Hunter has made a great advance upon other English dictionaries yet published, is the introduction of a vast number of words now obsolete or rarely in use. . . . The want of dates, or of any indication even of periods, however, infects all these portions of the work with an element of uncertainty which greatly detracts from their value. . . . The work would form a useful adjunct to every town library."—Acad., xxiv. 207.

He distinguished himself by his successful superintendence in Orissa and the southwestern division of Bengal during the famine of 1866, and received the thanks of the government. 2. The Annals of Rural Bengal, Lon., 1868, 8vo; 5th ed., 1872.

"The account we have given of his opening chapters will show how comprehensive have been the preliminary researches by which he has prepared himself for his task. The narrative to which these researches serve as the indispensable introduction hardly begins in the present volume. All that Mr. Hunter attempts to do is to paint the state of affairs in the frontier district during the years that immediately followed the change of government. With this view he shows us the company as a rural administrator and a rural manufacturer; he relates its dealings with the currency, and its essays towards an improved administration of civil and criminal justice."—*Sat. 11. The Imperial Gazetteer of India, Lon., 1881, 9 vols. 8vo; new ed., 1885-87, 14 vols.

"Dr. Hunter has rendered to the Indian Government and to English people generally the highest service a public servant could achieve, and one deserving of the highest distinctions a grateful nation can bestow, in at last making every Englishman who may consult his work feel indeed a citizen of India, and presenting in its true light a dependent empire, which for the most of us has hitherto been but a name associated with a vague idea of distant and barbaric splendour."—Ath., No. 2809.

"More than satisfies all the requirements of the gazetteer, at the same time that it gives a complete account of the history and political institutions of the country."—Spectator, liv. 1252.

"The volume devoted to India, No. VI. in the series, is perhaps the most remarkable. It has some of the best features of guide book, blue-book, philosophical treatise, administrative report, sportsman's directory, and historical essay. An experienced administrator fresh from work in the East has characterized it as a volume which enables the intelligent reader to dispense with several tomes of the usual Anglo-Indian library."—*Sat. "Excellent as this little book is in some ways, its title is misleading, and the work itself is disappointing as coming from one who can do and has done so much for Indian history as Dr. Hunter. . . . The present book, on examination, proves to be nothing more than a condensation of the article on India in the 'Imperial Gazetteer of India,' which has already been reproduced under the title of 'The Indian Empire.'"—Ath., No. 2880.

"It is not easy to say what is Mr. Buckle's precise standing as a philosopher. Twenty years ago he was worshipped by 'thinkers.' People who were not thinkers considered Mr. Buckle at once too bold and too cold. We have become accustomed to far greater boldness. . . . The doctrine of evolution has left him far behind, for his 'History of Civilization' took no note of our great ancestor Bathybius. As to Mr. Buckle's coldness, it was a statistical coldness. He found out that so many persons per annum posted unaddressed letters, and he drew depressing inferences. . . . Mr. Huth's book, which seems to be written with rare sincerity, shows us the man as he was, not the philosopher as he was supposed to be."—Sat. Rev., xlix. 120.

"Mr. Huth's biography would have been better if it had been made shorter by a good half. The chapter by Mrs. Huth is worth all the rest of the book, and really tells us all that is worth knowing about the personality of the historian."—Acad., xvii. 95.

Huxley, Thomas Henry, M.D., Ph.D., LL.D., F.R.S., b. 1825, at Ealing, Middlesex; was educated partly at the school in that town, of which his father was one of the masters; studied medicine at the Charing Cross Hospital in London; passed the first examination for M.B. at the University of London in 1845, with honors in physiology, and in 1846 took the diploma of the Royal College of Surgeons and entered the royal navy as assistant surgeon. In 1847 he was appointed to the "Rattlesnake," commissioned for the survey of the barrier reef of Australia, New Guinea, and the Louisiade Archipelago. In 1855 he was appointed professor of natural history at the Royal School of Mines, and in the same year Fullerian professor of physiology to the Royal Institution, and examiner in physiology and comparative anatomy at the University of London. On the promulgation of the Darwinian theory he became at once its strongest supporter: his influence both in bringing about its acceptance in the highest scientific circles and in making it popularly known has been very great. In 1863 he was elected professor of comparative anatomy to the Royal College of Surgeons, an office which he held till 1870. In 1872 he was elected lord rector of the University of Aberdeen for three years. He succeeded Mr. Buckland in 1880 as inspector of fisheries, became dean in the Normal School of Science at South Kensington a little later, and was elected president of the Royal Society in 1883. In 1885 he was compelled by overwork to resign that appointment together with his other offices, retaining only his position at the School of Science. He has contributed largely to the Transactions of various scientific societies and to leading English reviews. 1. On the Educational Value of the Natural History Sciences, Lon., 1854, 8vo. 2. "In this interesting and instructive volume thirteen essays are collected, originally published between 1869 and 1871, but each certainly of permanent value. They indicate, as their accomplished author says, 'the high-water mark of the various tides of occupation by which he has been carried along since the beginning of 1870.' . . . The opening essays are ethical in their subject-matter; the body of the work treats of various biological and palæontological, or, as we should rather say, ontogenetic, questions, and the closing essay is on the Berkeleian Metaphysics." —Ath., No. 2377.

"A very charming book. . . . The subject is introduced by an imaginary visit to London Bridge, the observation of the flowing of the stream and the rise and fall of the tides, and from this starting-point the natural phenomena connected with rivers are fully traced. . . . Many subjects are introduced which seem to have so little to do with the Thames that, on first turning over its pages, it appears like a collection of detached treatises having little relation to one another,—chemical experiments, meteorological charts, solar protuberances, deep-sea soundings, are all included,—but on reading the book from the beginning, (and most who begin will continue to the end,) it is evident that all these matters are necessary to a thorough appreciation of the subject. . . . The book will be invaluable in producing in young people an interest in the phenomena of nature."—Spectator, li. 123.

21. Science and Culture, and other Essays, Lon., 1881, 8vo.

"What is the function of science in modern culture? That is, in the main, the subject for discussion in this volume, so far as it can be said to deal with any one subject. The first four essays deal directly with it in relation to education, scientific, university, technical, and domestic. Essays v., viii., xi., and xii. deal with episodes in the history of science connected with the names of Priestley, Aristotle, Descartes, the early evolutionists, and Mr. Darwin. The sixth essay deals with scientific method, and is founded on a text given by Voltaire; the seventh and tenth discuss problems of biology and psychology as examples of the light thrown by the application of the scientific method; and the last essay of all treats of the connection between the biological sciences and medicine. Thus the volume as a whole gives a tolerably complete account of the aims and methods of modern science and its connection with other fields of human thought and activity."—Ath., No. 2830.

"There is—with an exception of one somewhat technical article, republished from a scientific journal—not one of the essays here brought together that does not afford keen pleasure to the intelligent reader."—Spectator, lv. 266.

"The writer has, among other requisites for poetical composition, the gift of clear, strong, and simple language; and she has one great gift for a poetess, in that she has something to say. . . . She has touches of great sweetness and pathos, and her pictures show at once an accurate observation of nature, a vivid and true imagination, and a strong sympathy with the common interests of human life."—*Sat. 21. Fated to be Free, 1875, 3 vols. p. 8vo; new ed, 1879, 1 vol.

"The deep poetical feeling of the author is conspicuous throughout. . . . The book abounds in enchanting descriptions of nature. . . . Miss Ingelow's pages sparkle with pleasant scenes of family life, into which she throws herself with extreme enjoyment. Her volumes are positively overdone and overrun with troops of laughing children, although she makes them prattle and play with such natural grace and feeling that it is not often we feel them otherwise. There is love-making enough, too, of one kind or another. Some of it is sketchy and consequently uninteresting; some of it grotesque and altogether improbable; but the affair into which she has thrown her heart is worked out in a shifting diorama of delightful little pictures in which the interest steadily culminates."—*Sat. "Mr. Ingleby's 'Essays' deal not only with subjects of interest in an interesting way, but show no small amount of originality of treatment. Indeed, their independence of view is what gives the essays the charm they possess. . . . Verses, Bost., 1870, 16mo; new ed., enl., 1873.

"She has more thought than went to the making of many a poem that will outlive many generations of men; she has fancy; she has force of feeling, and of natural feeling, though it too wholly and too strenuously possesses her; she has some imaginative insight, and apparently some spiritual insight; she has a cultivated mind, and apparently a wide experience of life. . . . Nevertheless, . . . the book is one of verses, and not of poems, though the author is a verse-maker of an exceptionally high class, and occasionally strays into the region of poetry."—Nation, xii. 183.

2. Bits of Travel, Bost., 1872, sq. 16mo: new ed., 1875.

"An extremely readable book, and more especially entertaining in the first half."—Nation, xiv. 407.

3. Bits of Talk about Home Matters, Bost., 1873, sq. 18mo.

"Our author's chief concern is with the treatment of children, and her remarks are addressed to (not to say aimed at) a class whose means permit them to take summer board in the country, to go abroad and settle in English lodging-houses, . . . in short, to gratify most of their wants. . . . The chapters on children are fruitful of suggestion, and are unexceptionable in spirit as they are agreeable in style."—Nation, xvi. 373.

4. The Story of Boon, [verse,] Bost., 1874, sq. 16mo; new ed., 1879. 5. Bits of Talk, in Verse and Prose, for Young Folks, Bost., 1876, sq. 18mo. 6. Mercy Philbrick's Choice, ("No Name" Ser.,) Bost., 1876, 16mo. 7. Hetty's Strange History, ("No Name" Ser.,) Bost., 1877, 16mo. 8. Bits of Travel at Home, Bost., 1878, sq. 18mo. 9. Bost., 1881, sq. 12mo. 12. A Century of Dishonor: a Sketch of the United States Government's Dealings with some of the Indian Tribes, N. York, 1881, 12mo.

"Mrs. Jackson seems to have written her 'sketch' under the impulse of a recent championship of the Poncas, in which she had entered into some controversy with the Secretary of the Interior regarding the proposed return to Dakota of the band now settled in the Indian Territory. . . . Its influence will work towards disunion among philanthropic people when there ought to be the utmost solidarity of effort."—Nation, xxxii. 152.

13. The Training of Children, N. York, 1882, 16mo. 14. Ramona, Bost., 1884, 12mo.

"The first half of the book is a series of most picturesque descriptions of summer life on a great California estate, in which are mingled, as episodes, traditions and incidents from the history of the missions in the days of their glory. . . . The second half . . . contains the exposure of the wrongs the Indian has suffered. . . . Pleased as the reader may be by the fair landscape spread out before him, he cannot believe that the figures are alive, that either their sufferings or their joys are real."—Nation, xl. 100.

15. The Hunter Cats of Connorloa. Illust. Bost., 1884, sm. 4to. 16. Zeph: a Posthumous Story, Bost., 1885, 12mo. 17. Glimpses of Three Coasts, Bost., 1886, 12mo. 18. Sonnets and Lyrics, Bost., 1886, 24mo.

"Her very last poems are certainly among the strongest she ever wrote. . . . This volume, as a whole, is more unequal than 'Verses.'"—Nation, xliii. 501.

"If this is not a great book, it is certainly a very remarkable one. . . . The present writer would stake here his critical reputation, whatever that may be worth, on the assertion that few in our day have done better service than Mr. Jackson by furnishing as he does so many independent, but in the end consilient, lines of argument which inevitably lead up to the conclusion that the laws of nature and the conscience of man, who is yet a part of nature, must have had a rational and moral origin."—Spectator, xlviii. 597.

James, Henry, [ante, vol. i., add.,] 1811–1882, b. at Albany, N.Y.; graduated at Union College 1830; studied theology at Princeton and afterwards in England, and adopted Swedenborgian views without becoming a member of the New Jerusalem Church. "We regard this as one of the more remarkable books of the day. It is an elaborate, earnest essay, endeavoring to reconcile philosophy and theology, in much the same line of thought which the author followed in his books entitled 'Christianity the Logic of Creation,' and 'Substance and Shadow,' but, as it seems to us, is much more clear and satisfactory."—Nation, ix. 436.

James, Henry, b. 1843, in New York City; son of the preceding; was educated under his father's supervision, for the most part in Europe, where he spent the years 1855–59. In 1862 he entered the Harvard Law School, and in 1865 began to contribute sketches to periodicals. During the next ten years he published in the Atlantic Monthly a number of short stories, which gained him a definite, though not extensive, reputation before he entered upon his career as a novelist. Since 1869 he has passed most of his time in Europe, and of late has taken up his residence in England. He has contributed articles, sketches, and stories to many periodicals, including the Revue des Deux Mondes, and most of his novels appeared originally as serials in the Atlantic Monthly and other magazines. 1. Transatlantic Sketches, Bost., 1875, 12mo.

"His sketches give us the very marrow of sensitive impression, and are positively better than the actual pilgrimage."—Nation, xx. 425.

2. A Passionate Pilgrim, and other Tales, Bost., 1875, 12mo.

"They are careful studies of character thrown into dramatic action, and the undercurrent of motive is, as it should be, not in the circumstances, but in the characters themselves."—Nation, xx. 425.

3. Roderick Hudson, Bost., 1875, 12mo.

"The serious intention to do the author's best is everywhere felt in this story, and it produces most excellent results. The simplicity and directness and quietness of the plot make the interest of its gradual development a matter of very considerable artistic skill, since it relies wholly on the phases and transformation of the characters involved."—Nation, xxii. 164.

4. The American, Bost., 1877, 12mo.

"The different threads are managed with rare skill. . . . The best thing of all, in our opinion, is the delicacy with which Madame de Cintré is drawn, with her shyness and gracious delicacy. The success here, attained as it is by that apparent simplicity which is the height of art, gives the novel a place among the best modern studies of society."—Nation, xxiv. 325.

5. Watch and Ward, Bost., 1878, 12mo.

"We cannot see what end Mr. James proposed to himself in this book. An interesting book may be written about uninteresting people, but it is by illustrating in them some touch of nature that makes the whole world kin, or by analysis that searches below every veil of circumstance and at last draws blood; but in 'Watch and Ward' we desire to keep all mantles decorously drawn and folded, lest by lifting one we see the wooden limbs and the strings whereby they are jerked."—Nation, xxvii. 117.

6. French Poets and Novelists, N. York, 1878, cr. 8vo. 7. The Europeans: a Sketch, Lon., 1878, 2 vols. p. 8vo; Bost., 1879, 12mo. 8. Daisy Miller, Bost., 1878, 12mo.

"It is the best thing that Mr. James has ever done,—i.e., the completest and the least touched by his mannerisms or limitations. It is a perfect study of a type not, alas! uncommon, but it is not offensively anatomical; the dry bones live, are clothed, the joints do not rattle, the smaller bones are not separate against a dark background, but cohere and move in a human fashion. It is true that poor Daisy is sacrificed to Mr. James's incapacity to get his dramatis personæ off the stage in any way except by killing them, but that is comparatively a small matter in a sketch like this, and in other respects we have Mr. James at his very best."—Nation, xxvii. 387.

9. An International Episode, N. York, 1879, 32mo. 10. Hawthorne, ("English Men of Letters,") Lon., 1879, p. 8vo.

"Mr. James tells us that 'American intellectual standards are vague,' and that 'Hawthorne's countrymen are apt to hold the scales with a rather uncertain hand and a somewhat agitated conscience.' In this respect, at least, he has completely avoided the faults of his compatriots. He holds the scales with a very certain hand, and with every sign of perfect tranquillity in that inner sanctuary which in him may be supposed to correspond to the tossed and troubled region of his fellow-countrymen's nature. Nevertheless, though thus patronizing in attitude, Mr. James does substantial justice to Hawthorne, with very slight exceptions."—Spectator, liii. 18.

"He has made a careful, conscientious, and even vivid literary portrait. . . . It has the advantage of being less formally a biography and more completely a criticism than any of its predecessors; it may, indeed, be said to be saturated with the essence of literary criticism. . . . We cannot help thinking that if he had had a quicker sympathy with Hawthorne he would not have been so deeply impressed with Hawthorne's provinciality and the blankness of his surroundings, and he would not have omitted so conspicuously to consider the poetic qualities of his writings. . . . His portrait of Hawthorne discloses what we believe to be the truth about him."—Nation, xxx. 80.

"Essentially unlike as the two writers are, Mr. James is imaginative enough to render Hawthorne's moods for us in a way that commands our assent to his rendering; besides, he knows New England down to its very roots; he moves at will between the American stand-point and the European; and he is master of a style of exceptional fineness and elasticity."—*Sat. 13. Diary of a Man of Fifty; [also] A Bundle of Letters, N. York, 1880, 32mo. 14. Washington Square. Illust. N. York, 1880, 16mo. 15. The Portrait of a Lady, Bost., 1881, 12mo; Lon., 3 vols. p. 8vo.

"An important work, the most important Mr. James has thus far written, and worthy of far more than mere perusal,—worthy of study, one is inclined to say. It is, in fact, a little too important,—to express by a paradox the chief criticism to be made upon it,—or, at all events, the only impression left by it which is not altogether agreeable. For the first two or three hundred pages one is beguiled by a kind of entertainment always of a high order,—the dissection of an interesting character by a clever and scrupulous demonstrator. After that, though it would be misleading to say that the interest flags,—the interest throughout the book being remarkable for its evenness,—the feeling supervenes that to be still entertained argues a happy aptitude for most serious and 'intellectual' delectation. . . . 'The Portrait of a Lady' is the most eminent example we have thus far had of realistic art in fiction à outrance, because its substance is thoroughly, and at times profoundly, real, and at the same time its presentation is imaginative."—Nation, xxxiv. 102.

"This novel, which is one of the most careful and elaborate that the author has hitherto published, . . . is marked by the same merits and the same defects which are to be noticed in nearly all that he has written. There is the same minute and accurate observation, the same adroitness in keeping the reader's curiosity, if not always his interest, alive to the end, the same ingenious analysis of superficial feeling and motive. But in the 'Portrait of a Lady,' as in so much that Mr. James has written, we cannot help remarking the care which the writer takes not to go down, if he can possibly avoid it, below the surface of his characters and of the situations in which he places them. And in those cases where he cannot escape doing so, he seems at once to lose hold of the characters whose outward and superficial qualities he depicts with so much ability. . . . Till the time for action comes, Mr. James's men and women are admirable imitations of human beings; but the moment the hour arrives for decision and deeds, they reveal themselves as mere simulacra."—Sat. Rev., lii. 703.

"If Mr. Henry James had called this book 'The Portrait of Two Gentlemen,' we might have admitted the aptness of the designation, for the real power of the book consists in the wonderful pictures given of Ralph Touchett and Mr. Osmand, who have rarely been equalled in fiction for the skill and delicacy of the painting. But as for Isabel Archer,—or Mrs. Osmond, as she afterwards becomes,—who is the lady of whom the portrait is taken, we venture to say that the reader never sees her, or realizes what she is, from the beginning of the book to the close. She is the one lady of whom no portrait is given, though she is studied till the reader is weary of the study."—Spectator, liv. 1504.

16. The Siege of London; The Pension Beaurepas; and The Point of View, Bost., 1883, 12mo.

"In some respects 'The Siege of London' is one of the best of Mr. James's international sketches. The skill with which he reproduces the impression made on the various persons with whom his heroine comes in contact is inimitable."—Nation, xxxvi. 301.

17. Daisy Miller: a Comedy, in Three Acts, Bost., 1883, 12mo.

18. A Little Tour in France, Bost., 1884, 12mo.

"Mr. James characterizes the papers which form this book as 'light pages,' and in truth all that is not volatile about them is the touch. . . . The point of view throughout is the sentimental, the dilettante. The superficial aspect treated is the purely picturesque."—Nation, xxxix. 358.

23. The Bostonians: a Novel, Lon., 1886, 3 vols. p. 8vo; N. York, 1 vol.

"It is apparently designed to bring out a number of contrasts,—the contrast between the ladies who are filled with the enthusiasm of the woman's-rights movement and the ladies who are not filled with anything of the kind; between the somewhat antique 'chivalrous' young Southern man and the brusque, progressive Northern young woman, with a redundancy of ideas; between Boston and, as logicians would say, all that is not Boston in the world. . . . The story drags in places, and the conversations betray that want of naturalness into which the author's passion for a sort of dramatic repartee leads him. Nevertheless, the criticism and analysis and observation are so good that we cannot refrain from admiration even when we do not always enjoy it."—Nation, xlii. 407.

"'The Bostonians' is a wonderfully clever book, so clever in many parts even in execution, and so original in conception, that one can almost pardon the unquestionable tedium of a large part of the second and third volumes, from which we get the impression that a comparatively slight study has been put under a microscope and rendered in all the extended dimensions of an artificially magnified image."—Spectator, lix. 388.

24. The Princess Casamassima: a Novel, Lon., 1886, 3 vols. cr. 8vo; N. York, 1 vol.

"One hardly stretches a point in drawing a parallel of improbability between the adventures of Aladdin with his Princess and the adventures of Hyacinth, bookbinder of Soho, with his Princess, 'the most wonderful woman in Europe.' Let it not be supposed that Mr. James has gone over to romance and magic; he has only selected people whom very few of us are likely ever to know, placed them in circumstances best suited to develop them, and dispassionately told the whole truth about them. . . . In this series of studies of exceptions, Mr. James shows a versatility and power hardly hinted at in his former work. Such complex and high-strung natures as Hyacinth and the Princess call out reserves of keenness and intellectual refinement unexpected even in him; and in the score of uncommon people temporarily united by common interest in a great question, his wit and sarcasm are agreeably tempered by a tenderness and even intensity of feeling which he has hitherto carefully repressed."—Nation, xliv. 123.

25. Partial Portraits, Lon. and N. York, 1888, p. 8vo. (Contains essays on Daudet, Guy de Maupassant, George Eliot, Tourgenieff, R. L. Stevenson, &c.)

"The trait which belongs to some phases of modern culture, indecision of judgment, is strongly marked in these essays. . . . Mr. James's criticism has a purely personal basis, and is to be explained by the special culture he possesses and the cosmopolitan experiences in which it has been developed. The grace of the essays and all their charm, in which qualities they excel, are due to this personal element finding expression through a highly-trained literary style."—Nation, xlvii. 75.

"He has been urged by its ever-increasing noxiousness to take up the cudgels against 'society journalism' and show up its infamy with all the power of his inimitable art."—Critic, x. 123.

General Criticism:

"Mr. Henry James is certainly a very remarkable illustration of the tendency of our age to subdivide in the finest way the already rather extreme division of labour, till a very high perfection is attained in producing articles of the most curiously specialized kind, though apparently without the power of producing anything outside of that kind. For a long time we have had novelists who are wonderfully skilful in a particular form of novels, but who seem almost unable to master more than one form for themselves. But Mr. Henry James, though he has attained a very great perfection in his own line, seems not to aim at anything quite so considerable as a story of human life of any sort. He eschews a story. What he loves is an 'episode,'—i.e., something which by the nature of the case is rather a fragment cut out of a life, and not a fair or average specimen of it, nor even such a part as would give you the best essence of the whole, but rather an eddy in it, which takes you for an interval out of its main current, and only ends as you get back into the main current again, or at least at the point at which you might get back into the main current again, if some event (accidental in relation to the art of the story) did not occur to cut off abruptly the thread of the narrative. . . . No doubt there is a wonderful skill in the writer who, avowedly refusing to tell you what can properly be called a story,—loving above all things to depict excursions of the heart and mind which fade away and end in nothing,—can yet interest you so deeply as he does in his delineation of these unfulfilled intentions of men, these manqué and tentative deviations into regions not adapted for embodiment into the substance of life. One might perhaps say that Mr. Henry James has discerned in relation to literature what has long been known in relation to art,—that with artists of any genius 'sketches' are apt to be more satisfying than finished pictures. But then the sketches we like so much in artists' studios are, though unfinished pictures, still pictures of what the painter has been most struck with, pictures in which he has given all that struck him most, and left only what did not strike him to be filled in by the fancy of the public. Now, Mr. Henry James does not give us sketches of the striking features in what he sees of human life and passion, so much as finished pictures of the little nooks and bays into which human caprice occasionally drifts, when the main current of life's deeper interests has left us for a moment on one side and rushed past us. He does not half-paint what is striking; he prefers rather to paint with wonderful care and precision what is not striking, or only striking by its contrast with what is usually thought so. . . . Mr. Henry James is not so much a novelist as an episodist, if such a term be allowable. But he is a wonderful episodist."—Spectator, lii. 277.

"If Mr. James be not incapable of describing passion, at all events he has still to show that he is capable of it. . . . He has introduced us to many characters who seemed to have in them capacities for the highest passion, . . . and yet he has never allowed them to bring these capacities to the proof. He uniformly evades the situation; but the evasion is managed with so much ingenuity and plausibility that, although we may be disappointed, or even irritated, we are deprived of the right of giving those emotions satisfactory expression."—Spectator, lii. 48.

"The style in which he has succeeded is adapted well enough for gentle satire on human weaknesses, for tender analysis of such elements of interest as exist in commonplace characters; it fails altogether when it has to deal with the really dark places of human nature."—Ath., No. 3089.

He made a collection of works of art, which now forms part of the collection of the Yale School of Fine Arts, another of old masters and works of sculpture, which belongs to the Holenden Gallery in Cleveland, another, of specimens of antique and modern Venetian glass, which he presented to the Metropolitan Museum of Art, and another, of laces, embroideries, and other textile fabrics, which was sold in New York in 1886. 1. "That part of Mr. Jarves's book which, written in the first person, tells of his own experiences as a collector and a student in Europe, is most interesting. . . . Mingled with this are many passages of interesting description of the men and things of Europe, especially of Italy, and the story rises to pathos in the description of the poor women who show pictures in Italian churches. It is one of the most interesting books that the time affords, and we have only to regret that a certain want of arrangement or of sequence keeps one from remembering as much of it as would be well to remember."—Nation, x. 194.

"The Young Squire to whom we are introduced in these pages is a distinct addition to our portrait-gallery of minor English worthies. . . . Those who were before inclined to suppose that the typical English squire of the seventeenth century was neither a roué nor a sot, neither like the Hon. Mr. Jeaffreson shows strenuous study of his subject, and of all the materials which can be brought in aid of it. . . . Whatever may be thought of his hostile conclusions, or of the tone in which he announces them, Mr. Jeaffreson's book is incontestably a solid array of facts and disquisitions, and a forcible indictment of Shelley as a man."—Ath., No. 3005.

Cambridge, where he graduated as senior classic in 1862 and was elected a Fellow. As a classical lecturer of his college he took an active part in organizing at Cambridge the system of inter-collegiate classical lectures, and with Prof. E. B. Cowell, supra, aided in founding the Cambridge Philological Society, of which he was the first secretary. In 1869 he was chosen to be public orator of the university, and in 1872 appointed a tutor of Trinity College. In 1875 he was called to the chair of Greek at the University of Glasgow, and in 1889 became professor of Greek in the University of Cambridge. He has taken an active part in promoting the study of modern Greek, and his efforts led to the establishment at Athens in 1886 of a British school of classical and archæological studies. In 1878 Prof. Jebb received from the King of Greece the gold cross of the Order of the Saviour, in recognition of his services to Greek studies. He has also received degrees from Harvard University on the occasion of a visit to the United States in 1884, and from Cambridge and Edinburgh. "It comes not only from a competent hand, but from the hand best fitted for the task that could have been found. . . . He has brought to the task both the ample knowledge and the perceptive sympathy of a tried worker in Bentley's own field. . . . Original authorities have been used throughout, and the whole story has the air of life and reality which second-hand work always misses."—Sat. Rev., liii. 603.

11. Sophocles: the Plays and Fragments: with Critical Notes, Commentary, and Translation in English Prose. Parts I.–III. Cambridge, 1883–88, 8vo. (These three volumes comprise the Œdipus Tyrannus, Œdipus Coloneus, and Antigone.)

"We have unquestionably in this edition of Sophocles, so far as it has proceeded, a splendid example of the work which can be done by the English school of classics at its best. . . . The combination in one person of such scholarship, literary excellence, and critical refinement must always be rare; but we hope that English scholars will keep Prof. Jebb's work before their eyes as an ideal to be aimed at, and as a model of what the editing of the classics in England ought to be."—Quarterly Review, April, 1890, p. 442.

12. Homer: an Introduction to the Iliad and Odyssey, Glasgow, 1887, p. 8vo; 3d ed., 1888.

"The four chapters of which the work consists are devoted to 'General Characteristics,' 'The Homeric World,' 'Homer in Antiquity,' and 'The Homeric Question,' the epic language being dealt with in the appendix. . . . We heartily commend the hand-book before us to the diligent study of all beginners and many 'ripe scholars.'"—Ath., No. 3094.

"It is a masterpiece of scholarship, of compression, and of the rarest quality in Homeric criticism,—of common sense."—Sat. Rev., lxiii. 483.

Jefferies, John Richard, 1848–1887, (the first baptismal name does not seem to have been used by him,) b. at Swindon, Wiltshire; son of a farmer; was chiefly self-educated; began writing for local papers at an early age, and became a regular correspondent of the Wilts and Gloucestershire Standard, while contributing articles to Fraser's Magazine, &c. In 1877 he removed to Surbiton, near London, and contributed articles to the Pall Mall Gazette, Longman's Magazine, and other periodicals. He spent the last six years of his life, when suffering from almost constant illness, at different country villages, and died at Goring, in Sussex. For biog., see Besant, Walter, supra. 1. 11. Green Ferne Farm, Lon., 1880, p. 8vo.

"As a work of art—whether novel, story, tale, or romance—it is absolutely non-existent. . . . It is full of thoughtful and accurate descriptions of the face of nature and of still-life."—Spectator, liii. 305.

12. Hodge and his Masters, Lon., 1880, 2 vols. cr. 8vo.

"A valuable contribution to the practical literature of country life, . . . including all the varieties of work and circumstance which are exhibited under the general designation of farming."—Sat. Rev., xlix. 795.

13. Round about a Great Estate, Lon., 1880, cr. 8vo.

"It would be impossible for Mr. Jefferies to write anything about the country that is not more or less enjoyable and instructive; but even Mr. Jefferies's vein of knowledge may be exhausted with indefatigible use, and we are scarcely surprised that it shows signs of giving out. . . . When we accompany him in his rounds on 'the great estate,' we feel that the lounging strolls become occasionally wearisome. . . . Yet, when all has been said, we are happy to admit that we know no other writer on rural matters who could give us so small a volume with so many charms."—Sat. Rev., l. 277.

14. Wood Magic: a Fable, Lon., 1881, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"Mr. Jefferies has turned his knowledge of wild things and their ways to imaginative account, and has made his animals actors in a drama which has the actual world of woods and meadows for its theatre and the facts of brute life for its incidents, and which is as circumstantial in method and as naturalistic in effect as a chapter of Balzac."—Ath., 2797.

15. Bevis: the Story of a Boy, Lon., 1882, 3 vols. cr. 8vo. 16. Nature near London, Lon., 1883, p. 8vo.

"Dull indeed and lifeless do the 'word-pictures' and scenery of novelists seem compared with the wealth, the freshness, and the fulness of these pages. Mr. Jefferies is the Meissonier of those who paint with words."—Sat. Rev., lv. 639.

17. The Story of my Heart: my Autobiography, 1883, p. 8vo.

"The pages throb with passionate vigour, and fall into dreamy contemplation. . . . We feel, without being told, that the stirring thoughts have been forced from him by earnestness of heart, and they express his most serious convictions; but the wonder is he has not presented them with more point and artistic sequence and more rounded effect. . . . The book is a fragment of outspoken moods, pleasant to read, and difficult to criticise from its disorder. It treats of the ideal in life, the laws of chance, the absence of time, the relentlessness in nature."—Acad., xxiv. 294.

18. Red Deer, Lon., 1884, p. 8vo. 19. The Life of the Fields, Lon., 1884, p. 8vo.

"Among all the varied papers in this book the freshest, the most suggestive, and the most interesting at the present moment is that which deals with country literature. . . . We owe to Mr. Jefferies many delightful hours, but none more delightful than those spent in reading this dainty volume."—Sat. Rev., lviii. 61.

20. The Dewy Morn, Lon., 1884, 2 vols. cr. 8vo.

"Mr. Jefferies, we take it, is not a novelist at all. He can

21. After London; or, Wild England. In Two Parts. Part I. Lon., 1885, p. 8vo.

"A romance of the future. The scene is laid in an England gone to ruin and relapsed into the desolation of prehistoric nature. . . . The idea, it will be seen, is uncommonly fresh and striking. It is wrought out in a fashion that shows Mr. Jefferies at his best in some ways, and at his worst in others."—Ath., No. 2998.

General Criticism:

"A literary Leatherstocking, his style, his mental qualities, the field he works in, the chase he follows, are peculiar to himself, and as he is without a rival, so he is without a second."—Ath., No. 2737.

"In Jefferies' later books the whole of the country life of the nineteenth century will be found displayed down to every detail. The life of the farmer is there; the life of the labourer; the life of the gamekeeper; the life of the women who work in the fields, and of those who work at home. . . . He revealed Nature in her works and ways; the flowers and the fields; the wild English creatures; the hedges and the streams; the wood and coppice. . . . But this is not all. For next he took the step—the vast step—across the chasm which separates the poetic from the vulgar mind, and began to clothe the real with the colours and glamour of the unreal; to write down the response of the soul to the phenomena of nature: to interpret the voice of Nature speaking to the soul. Unto this last. And then he died; his work, which might have gone on forever, cut off almost at the commencement."—W. Besant: The Eulogy of Richard Jefferies, 228.

Jenkin, Henry Charles Fleeming, F.R.S., 1833–1885, b. in Kent, Eng.; son of the preceding; was educated at Edinburgh, in Germany, and in France, where he began his career as a civil engineer. Returning to England in 1851, he advanced so rapidly in his profession that the testing of the first Atlantic cable, in 1858, was put under his charge. In 1865 he became professor of engineering in University College, London, and in 1868 was called to the newly-founded chair of engineering in the University of Edinburgh. His criticism on The Origin of Species in the North British Review for 1867 led to a modification of certain views on the part of its author. In 1877 he delivered two lectures before the Edinburgh Philosophical Institution on sanitary houses, which gave rise to the formation of sanitary protection associations in Edinburgh and in other cities of Great Britain. "This is a clever little book in its way. . . . Its purpose may be shortly described by saying that it is intended to draw attention to the dangers and evils produced by our masses of pauperism. In style, as may be guessed from its name, it belongs to the school of Dickens, and is by no means free from the ordinary faults of the imitators of the great writer whose loss we are lamenting."—*Sat. Jennings, Mrs. Kate Vaughan. Rahel: her Life and Letters, Lon., 1876, 8vo.

"A book, not adequate indeed, but sympathetically written by a person so well versed in the German life of the time that her knowledge is almost a trial to the reader, whom she perpetually supposes to know as much as herself. . . . We have to thank Mrs. Jennings for giving us . . . a full and yet concise account of so interesting a figure."—Sat. Rev., xlii. 666.

Jennings, Louis John, b. 1837, in London; acted as special correspondent of the London Times in 1863–68 in India and in the United States, and was afterwards for some years editor of the New York Times and made through its columns a successful attack upon the Tammany Ring. In 1876 he returned to England, and was elected M.P. for Stockport in 1885 and again in 1886. He is a regular contributor to the Quarterly Review. 1. Eighty Years of Republican Government in the United States, Lon., 1867, 8vo.

"All the narrative parts—all parts, in short, for which Mr. Jennings could draw his materials from books, are admirable, and the tone is throughout kindly. The author, too, writes like a gentleman, and evidently tries—as well as strong conservative prejudices and a too great eagerness for generalization will let him—to do justice. We, however, regret the success of the book in England, as indicated by the sale of two editions. We are satisfied it will only thicken the fog through which most Englishmen look at the United States."—Nation, vi. 133.

"It is a temperate, impartial, and thoughtful estimate of parties, principles, and social character."—Sat. Rev., xxiv. 823.

"Mr. Jennings notes all that is best worth seeing. . . . Rev.*, lii. 307.

4. (Ed.) The Croker Papers: Correspondence and Diaries of the Late Right Hon. John Wilson Croker, Secretary to the Admiralty from 1809 to 1830, Lon., 1884, 3 vols. 8vo.

"Altogether these volumes must be regarded as among the most valuable and readable contributions which have yet been made towards an elucidation of the political history of this country during the first fifty years of the present century."—Sat. Rev., lviii. 664.

"We do not in any way blame Mr. Jennings for making the best of his hero. It is far better that a biographer should act like a fair and reasonable advocate than that he should attempt to play the part of a judge. The manner, also, in which the letters and extracts from the Diary are threaded together is most satisfactory. Just enough of the current history is told to remind readers of the course of events: but otherwise the Papers are left to themselves. . . . The three large volumes of which the book consists are full of matter, and that of the most interesting kind." —Spectator, lvii. 1483.

Jeremiah, John. 1. Notes on Shakespeare, and Memorials of the Urban Club: comprising a Succinct Account of the Life and Times of the Great Dramatist, also a History of the Urban Club, Lon., 1876, 8vo.

"The Urban Club meets in the old gate-house of St. John of Jerusalem at Clerkenwell. It was at the old gate-house Dr. Samuel Johnson met Cave, his first patron, and it was there he ate his dinner behind a screen, because the condition of his apparel prevented him sitting down at table with Cave's well-clothed guests. . . . Again, it was at the old gate-house Garrick is said to have made his first appearance as an actor. . . . Furthermore, once a year, on the anniversary of Shakspeare's death, (and birth, as some think,) the Club celebrates the event by a boar's-head dinner at the old gate. . . . The 'Notes on Shakespeare' are professedly nothing more than gleanings from many sources strung together into a chronological order, together with the poet's will, and a list of plays the poet did not write."—Ath., No. 2548.

8. (Ed.) Visitations of the Diocese of Norwich, A.D. 1492–1532, (Camden Soc.,) Lon., 1888, 8vo.

"The text of the above volume is one of the most valuable contributions to English history ever issued by the Camden Society. . . . His [Dr. Jessopp's] introduction is not worthy of him. . . . The writer is not at his best when dealing with dry facts, or when arguing on them. As one of the most delightful essayists of his day,—one might almost say the master of antiquarian romance,—he is unrivalled, and he has probably done more than any one living to popularize antiquarian study; but his Pegasus goes very reluctantly in the shafts of hard work."—WALTER RYE: Acad., xxxv. 3.

Jevons, William Stanley, LL.D., F.R.S., 1835–1882, b. in Liverpool, Eng.; was the son of an iron-merchant of that city, and grandson of William Roscoe, (q. v., ante, vol. i.) He was educated at the High School of the Mechanics' Institute, Liverpool, and at University College, London; held an appointment in the Royal Mint in New South Wales 1854–59, and graduated M.A. at London University 1862, winning the gold medal for logic, philosophy, and political economy, and being elected a Fellow in 1864. In 1866 he was appointed professor of logic and mental and moral philosophy, and Cobden lecturer on political economy, in Owens College, Manchester, and resigned that position in 1876 to accept the chair of political economy in University College, London, which he held till 1881, when he gave up academic work to devote himself to literature. To the point of view itself there seems to us something wanting,—namely, the power of showing a reasonable connection between the formal method of inference from assumed premises and the application of reason to show what premises ought to be assumed."—Spectator, xliv. 196.

18. Investigations in Currency and Finance. Edited, with an Introduction, by H. S. Foxwell. Lon., 1884, 8vo.

"Mr. Jevons's investigations are divided into two classes,—Commercial Fluctuations and Currency. There is a tide in the affairs of business men which the statist resolves into distinct fluctuations. . . . These and minor oscillations are exhibited in the book before us by means of beautiful diagrams containing the returns of the Bank of England averaged over periods of several years. . . . From 'Commercial Fluctuations' we pass to Currency,—'the burning question of bimetallism and technical questions relating to the age, weight, and cost of the gold metallic currency.' . . . Prof. Foxwell has caught the spirit of the work which he edits and describes. . . . The introduction is worthy of the author introduced. It is congenial to the work of Mr. Jevons. And yet it is substantive and individual."—F. Y. Edgeworth: Acad., xxvi. 38.

19. Letters and Journals. Edited by his Wife. Lon., 1886, 8vo.

"A singularly full and rich record of a memorable mental history. . . . Perhaps Stanley Jevons hardly offers the conditions of a striking and picturesque biography. . . . All that is given us is the record of a calm, uninterrupted flow of activity towards a well-conceived and worthy end."—Spectator, lix. 783.

"The strength and thoroughness of his political hatreds are of no country: they are those of the advanced democrat, pure and simple. The quaintest conceit in the 'Comedy' illustrates this, when, during an interlude of tableaux, the scene being Hades, Pluto calls Thiers, and, giving him a pair of pincers and a hammer, bids him 'undo the chains which still bind Napoleon I. to the pillory, and substitute for him the monster [Bismarck] who is now ravaging the earth.'"—Spectator, liii. 949.

"The easy and graceful style of which Prof. Johnston is master would make almost any subject attractive in his hands, and the subject that he has chosen is well fitted to be treated in such a style. . . . The dominant idea of the book is the spontaneous generation, so to speak, of democracy upon Connecticut soil. There and nowhere else, according to Prof. Johnston, did it originate. . . . Matter so highly contentious as this ought to be very carefully stated, and we do not find that Prof. Johnston's proofs are altogether convincing."—Nation, xlv. 15.

Narrative of Military Operations directed, during the Late War between the States, by Joseph E. Johnston, General C.S.A., N. York, 1874, imp. 8vo.

"He has simply written an earnest, almost passionate defence of himself before the Southern people from the charge of having caused or contributed to their defeat. . . . We have therefore a contribution to controversial polemics rather than to military history, although much light is incidentally thrown upon some important phases of the conflict."—Nation, xviii. 333.

"His book is truly a most valuable 'contribution to the history of the war.' We regret only that it is marred by a controversial and carping spirit, which, while showing the critical powers of the author, leaves the reader possibly more prepossessed against him than the same story would do if told by any other hand than that of the able commander who seems so over-careful of his own reputation." —*Sat. "It is . . . a warm and affectionate eulogy, in which no little literary skill is used to heighten the color of whatever can honor his memory and to apologize for whatever could detract from his fame. . . . The book abounds with interesting incidents, showing traits of character in the subject of the memoir that are most attractive, often charming. . . . "The last sentence of the Preface to this rather ponderous book gives the key-note to it and to its author:—'The book is sent forth to the world, with full confidence, as one of the best contributions ever made to the great cause of education, certain ultimately, if not immediately, to take an eminent place in educational literature, and to do the highest service in what is of paramount importance to national and universal well-being,—the education of our children.' . . . From innumerable volumes, lectures, magazine articles, newspaper 'leaders,' he has collected materials for this body of Combe divinity. . . . There is no guide more complete to the various educational problems and controversies of this generation and the last."—Ath., No. 2697.

"He relates his experience as a 'thorough' John Bull in Ireland, and it is not the less valuable that the lessons we learn from it have a wider bearing than those he would intentionally inculcate. His agricultural teaching is practical and sound. . . . Yet his book, written in the good faith of a cocksure man, sufficiently explains, though it does not excuse, the revolt of his tenantry."—Spectator, liii. 120.

Hum., 1839; was Fellow 1838–70, and tutor 1842–70, and was then elected master; ordained 1842; vice-chancellor of the university 1882–86; Regius professor of Greek since 1855. He contributed to the celebrated "Essays and Reviews" an essay on the Interpretation of Scripture. 1. (Trans.) The Dialogues of Plato: with Analyses and Introductions, Lon., 1871, 4 vols. 8vo; 2d ed., 1875, 5 vols. (An index to the work, forming a separate volume, was compiled by Evelyn Abbott, q. v., supra.)

"The present work is mainly, though not wholly, of a popular character. It is addressed to a wide but not the widest circle of readers. The more general reader will hardly think it within his horizon to differentiate Plato from Plotinus, but will put both aside as 'too learned' for them. But there still remain among the millions of English-speaking men a few whose education has been carried far enough to make them reasonably curious about Plato, though they have not acquired classical knowledge enough to read him in the original. Even the classical student who reads Greek, but not fluently, may be glad to have a competent and trustworthy guide and closet companion. The elaborately written introductions with which each dialogue is prefaced are skilfully contrived to meet the requirements of both these classes of readers."—Sat. Rev., xxxi. 471.

2. (Trans.) Thucydides: with Introduction, Marginal Analysis, Notes, and Indexes, Oxford, 1881, 2 vols. 8vo.

"Students will be as grateful to Professor Jowett for his second volume [containing the notes] as they will be ready to dispense with the aid of his first."—Sat. Rev., lii. 521.

3. (Trans.) The Politics of Aristotle: with Introduction, Marginal Analysis, Essays, Notes, and Indices, Oxf., 1885, 2 vols. 8vo.

"Certainly those who think, and whose Greek enables them to use an independent judgment, may safely obtain many a lesson in style from this as from all the translator's writings, if they can conquer the irritation of incessant correcting and the fatigue of a perpetual watch. And the other reader, if he must read something called Aristotle, and is willing, in spite of all, to surrender himself to the arts of the Professor, by all means let him begin. . . . He will most likely go on to the end, and rise with a pleasant sense of having achieved the 'Politics.' The only drawback is that he will be mistaken."—Sat. Rev., lxi. 649.

(The discussion is carried on in the form of dialogues between a great number of interlocutors representing many different views on philosophical and religious subjects.)

"Most people would regard this treatise, popular and fascinating as it is in form and style, as a work not merely of the highest erudition, (which it is,) but of the most laborious research, which only a writer in the fullest enjoyment of his faculties could have carried out with such spirit and so much accuracy of detail. Yet Dr. Kalisch throws it off during a period of extreme debility, when unable to prosecute his own special studies. We venture to think that the volume will do more for his fame than any of the volumes yet published of his Commentary."—Sat. Rev., l. 55.

While men could not yet speak with their mouths, but held intercourse only by signs and gestures, they looked up at the sun and made their mouths round after his form, and so they began both to say and to write O. This O was presently taken to signify (amongst other things) unity, and so was I, standing for one finger. . . . That his scheme of reform is not perfected, that it is nowhere clearly and fully defined and expressed, is, we may suppose, due to his premature and lamented death."—Arthur Arnold: Acad., xv. 428.

Keane, John Friar Thomas, b. 1854, at Whitby, Yorkshire: son of Rev. William Keane, infra; ran away from the Royal Naval School, Newcross, when twelve years old, and went to sea, and has since been mate of many vessels, chiefly in the East India trade. He acquired a knowledge of Hindustani and Arabic, served in the Turkish army in 1877, made a pilgrimage to Mecca and Medina in 1878, afterwards studied medicine at the University of Edinburgh, but has since returned to his original profession. He has contributed to the Pall Mall Gazette and other papers. 1. Six Months in Meccah: an Account of the Mohammedan Pilgrimage to Meccah recently accomplished by an Englishman professing Mohammedanism, Lon., 1881, 8vo; new ed., 1887, p. 8vo.

"The descriptions of Mecca itself, the holy shrine of the Kaabeh and its precincts, and of the people the author came across during his sojourn, are very graphic. . . . The pilgrimage was a very bold and adventurous undertaking."—Sat. Rev., li. 728.

2. My Journey to Medinah: describing a Pilgrimage to Medinah performed by the Author disguised as a Mohammedan, Lon., 1881, 8vo.

"If the author has very much less to record in this volume,—no grand effects like the mass of worshippers at Mecca or the vast confusion of the journey to Arafat.—there is no falling off in cleverness, which perhaps is even more conspicuously shown in the success with which he has treated the ordinary details and adventures of a caravan march."—Ath., No. 2818.

3. On Blue Waters: Some Narratives of Sport and Adventure in the Modern Merchant Service, Lon., 1883, 8vo.

"In the present volume he is in, and on, his own element. . . . He has spent several years before the mast, and professes to give his own experiences. . . . But this clever book depends less for its effect on descriptions of striking incidents than on the vivid impression it leaves of the general tenor of the sailor's life and his way of looking at things."—Ath., No. 2906.

4. Three Years of a Wanderer's Life, 1887, 2 vols. cr. 8vo.

"His wanderings are not of a commonplace order. They are mostly by sea; but he has tried every capacity, from first-class passenger on board a well-found liner to that of sailor out of work on the tramp from Liverpool to London. In every capacity he appears to preserve his good humour, while his powers of observation and narration are such as to interest the reader in every phase of his career. In fact, this is a thoroughly readable book, though some of the adventures narrated may require to be taken with a grain of salt."—Spectator, lx. 1189.

"As far as his book deals with the purer and more attractive aspects of Nature-worship, it is admirable. But into the legends of the Nature-gods are inextricably woven survivals of the ruder forms of old legend and belief, and these, we think, are really quite as 'primitive' as the elements of Nature-worship to which Mr. Keary devotes his space."—*Sat. "The whole book tends to strengthen the conviction that the slavery question is one which cannot, either as a matter of principle or of results, be treated apart from the one great question of civil or religious liberty, as it concerns the individual members of every form of human society throughout the world."—*Sat. "The book is so charming, so entertaining, so stamped with the impress of a strong, remarkable, various nature, that we feel almost tormented in being treated to a view only of the youthful phases of the character."—Nation, xxvii. 368.

4. Records of Later Life, Lon., 1882, 3 vols. p. 8vo.

"Mrs. Kemble has almost every gift as a correspondent that a letter-writer of the letter-writing sex can have,—a simple, straightforward style; a love of detail, and a capacity for distinguishing between the interesting and the tedious in detail; a knowledge of character, the knack of telling a story, a keen sense of humor and sensitive imagination, and in everything perfect naturalness and freedom from affectation. . . . The correspondence, which is accompanied by a good deal of explanatory comment, makes a very charming addition to the literature of 'reminiscences.'"—Nation, xxv. 270.

"The greater part of the matter consists of letters written by Mrs. Kemble to friends, . . . with occasional explanations and additional matter introduced so as to maintain a consecutive narrative, when the letters would fail to do so. . . . The book owes a good deal of its attraction to the singular contrast of the two modes of existence exhibited in it. The solitude, the discomforts, and the uncongenial surroundings of the American life described alternate with delightful accounts of the best and most cultivated society which the England and the London of fifty years since was capable of affording. . . . For their excellent matter, good writing, and extensive variety of subject and interest, these volumes must be welcomed as a great accession to the existing stores of autobiography."—Sat. Rev., liv. 56.

5. Notes upon some of Shakespeare's Plays, Lon. and N. York, 1882, cr. 8vo.

"Almost as desultory as its predecessors, and quite as delightful. . . . The most important of the Shakespearian essays are the two dealing with 'Macbeth,' and containing a subtle analysis of the character of 'Lady Macbeth.' . . . But more important . . . is the essay 'On the Stage,' which should be read and pondered by every one who takes an intelligent interest in the drama and in the theatre."—Nation, xxxvi. 175.

"We close the book, thankful to Mrs. Kemble even for her verbal criticisms, (which are the least attractive part of her work,) inasmuch as they have helped us to realize more fully the marvellous imaginative power of 'Shakespeare.'"—Spectator, lvi. 53.

6. Poems, Lon., 1883, p. 8vo.

"In the unforced spontaneity of her song and sudden bursts of poetic inspiration she offers a curious contrast to the æsthetic school of poetry of our own day. . . . Fanny Kemble's work seems to contain a vital root of poetry, while art has done next to nothing in her case to give it that perfection of force which we often find in the verses of contemporary poets, who seem on the other hand wanting in that organic impulse without which the most beautiful arrangement of words seems doomed to remain but a barren blossom."—Ath., No. 2933.

"Kendall is the first poet of Australian birth whose poems have taken a permanent place in Australian literature. . . . More than any other his work is redolent of the soil: it is pervaded by that intimité not always found in his contemporaries. In his verse there is an echo of the dripping gorges, a perfume of the odorous gum-forests, a distinct impress of native influences which have never been crossed by actual contact with the aspects of Nature in the Old World. Wild-flowers of song, swift whirls of wailful wind and rhymes of rain, the mournful marsh-fowl's cry, the bark of the wild dingo, the notes of the silver-voiced bell-bird, and the changeful forest life around him, set to woodland music, are Kendall's best offerings. His reed was of no great compass, but had a few sweet notes that linger in the ear and bring back visions of the lonely bush in a manner which no other writer has accomplished."—Contemporary Rev., lii. 407.

"We already knew, from 'That Very Mab,' that Miss Kendall had no lack of wits, or of wit; but in that first book of hers there was too little order. To read it required effort. . . . In the present volume the cleverness and the wit have more justice done them, owing to the restraints of verse."—Acad., xxxii. 313.

Kennan, George, b. 1845, at Norwalk, Huron Co., O.; became a telegraph-operator, and was in the employment of the Russo-American Telegraph Company as leader of an exploring party 1865-66, and as superintendent of construction for the middle district of the Siberian division 1866-68, when the enterprise was abandoned. In 1870 he made an extensive journey of exploration in the Caucasus, and in 1885-86 travelled fifteen thousand miles through Northern Russia and Siberia, visiting the prisons and penal settlements, making observations and collecting information from exiles and officials, which he has embodied in a series of articles in the Century Magazine. Tent-Life in Siberia, and Adventures among the Koraks and other Tribes in Kamt-chatka and Northern Asia, N. York, 1870, 12mo; 5th ed., 1889.

"Without affectation or pretension, he has written a book which is so true and life-like that Sir Roderick Murchison calls it the pick of recent books of travel. . . . But Mr. Kennan's book is much more than a narrative of personal adventure; it is a valuable contribution to science. The author tells us much about the physical geography and resources of this unknown Kamtchatka, and much about the languages, customs, and habits of the various tribes . . . who dwell in it."—Nation, xiii. 145.

"Mr. Kennan has written a very interesting book. . . . The adventures he met with by the way, the characteristics of the various tribes with whom he sojourned, and the general features of the country have furnished him with an ample supply of materials, and he has succeeded in putting them together into a very readable shape."—*Sat. "A cheery biography is a blessing to readers. . . . To read about Michael William Balfe, for instance, is almost as enlivening as it would be to go to a picnic with Mark Tapley. . . . The book is full of anecdote, and we find no fault with the writer's enthusiasm for his subject: the critics had their say in their day; now it is the biographer's turn, and he brightens up his book very much by his pugnacity."—Spectator, xlviii. 1203, 1233.

"Mr. Kenyon, . . . a feeble writer, seems to have fair intentions; but a relative is necessarily biassed, and there are parts of Lord Kenyon's character—his parsimony, his strong temper, and his blundering in English and in Latin, which he was foolishly fond of inappropriately quoting on the bench—on which Lord Campbell, following Mr. Townsend, amusingly expatiates, and on which Mr. Kenyon is naturally reserved."—*Sat. "It would be strange, indeed, if the man who was the friend of the Princess Charlotte, who had fought at Waterloo, and who had met in the course of a long lifetime the celebrated in almost every capital of Europe, could not have written an interesting biography. But our author has done something more than merely record and remember; he has opinions of his own which have their weight, he has studied and not merely seen life, his humour is happy, he can tell a story well, and he is good enough when he has to be instructive to be as light and agreeable as possible."—Acad., ix. 452.

Kerr, Walter Montagu, d. 1888. The Far Interior: a Narrative of Travel and Adventure from the Cape of Good Hope across the Zambesi to the Lake Regions of Central Africa. Map and Illust. Lon., 1886, 2 vols. 8vo.

"This is one of the most charming books of travel that we ever remember to have read. It is full of incident and adventure, described in the pleasantest of sub-humorous styles. The author travelled through regions in the wilds of Central Africa where no white man had ever been before, alone and unaided. He started on his journey without any blowing of trumpets by scientific or religious societies, and with little more paraphernalia or preparation than a man going out on an ordinary driving-tour in a settled country. He carried his journey through according to his predetermined plan, without violence, fuss, bluster, or a vast expenditure."—Spectator, lix. 1562.

"It is too prolix. . . . There is a considerable amount of fine writing, which might have been judiciously omitted, and a somewhat wearisome reiterance of trivial incidents, important only to the narrator. Otherwise it is a spirited record of what may be fairly described as a brilliant episode in the history of African exploration."—A. H. Keane: Acad., xxx. 340.

3. Systematic Geology. Illustrated by Twenty-Eight Plates and Twelve Analytical Geological Maps, and accompanied by a Geological and Topographical Atlas. (Report, &c., vol. i.) Wash., 1878, 8vo.

"After more than ten years' labor, Mr. King sums up the results of his own and his associates' work in this volume on the systematic geology of the region they have surveyed. . . . The present volume, last in order of time, but numbered as first in the series, is devoted to a general view of the scientific results and conclusions of the survey. . . . The most satisfactory part [sic] of Mr. King's work, next to its scientific thoroughness, is the breadth of view which embraces in one field the correlation of such extended forces, and the vigor of grasp with which the author handles so large a subject without allowing himself to be crushed by details."—Nation, xxviii. 73.

"It is a very remarkable poem. The writer does not seem so much to compose it as to breathe it forth; it is the fruit of intense personal feeling; it glows with the fires of an absolute conviction. . . . The 'Disciples' whose sufferings are recorded are some of those Italians who looked to Mazzini as their chief. . . . As a rule, the poetry lies more in the thing thought than in the thing said. There is, too, a conspicuous want of poetical art."—Sat. Rev., xxxviii. 185.

Kinglake, Alexander William, [ante, vol. i., where his name is erroneously given as John Alexander and the date of his birth as 1802, add.,] 1811–1890, b. at Taunton; graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge, 1832; called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn 1837, but retired from practice in 1856; elected M.P. for Bridgewater 1857, and re-elected 1868, but unseated on petition; lord of the manor of Saltmoor, Somersetshire, and deputy-lieutenant of the county. He accompanied the English army to the Crimea in 1854. The Invasion of the Crimea: its Origin, and an Account of its Progress down to the Death of Lord Raglan: vols. i. and ii., Edin. and Lon., 1863, 8vo; 4th ed. same year.

"Long expected and desired, Mr. Kinglake's history comes at last. And it comes entirely worthy of the genius of the author. It will be read with admiration and delight by all but those who will find in it the judgment of history—of a history that will not die—upon their own misdeeds. A great and immortal addition has been made to the historical literature of England."—Sat. Rev., xv. 82, 113, 147, 177.

Vols. iii. and iv., 1868.

"The polished diction and burnished style which first made their author famous is still maintained in these volumes; and were the interest of the subject even less momentous, they would be eagerly read as specimens of a literary production of consummate skill."—Sat. Rev., xxv. 852.

Vol. v., 1875.

"The whole story of Inkerman, as Mr. Kinglake tells it, is a loud protest in favour of British tradition, as well as an eloquent record of British valour. . . . Mr. Kinglake's treatment of our allies is from first to last as unjust as his personal estimate of our own leaders is exaggerated. . . . Mr. Kinglake's views of the comparative merits of English and French soldiers and their generals are out of harmony with the historical spirit of the age."—Sat. Rev., xxxix. 185, 222.

"The manner in which Mr. Kinglake has treated the subject dealt with in the fifth volume is admirable. Under his hand order is educed out of chaos, and the most confused battle in history becomes comparatively easy to understand."—Ath., No. 2466.

"No exception can . . . be fairly taken to the amount of space which Mr. Kinglake has devoted to his description of the battle: whether he has turned it to the best use is another matter. There are two ways, speaking broadly, in which such an event may be described: there is the critical method, which points out the mistakes made on both sides, and teaches how they should be avoided in the future; and there is the sort of writing known as word-painting, with the object of making a picture which shall enable the reader to realize the scene, without distracting his attention by drawing inferences. This last is the mode affected by special war correspondents, who, however, sometimes interpolate criticism in their narrative very freely; and it is the plan adopted by Mr. Kinglake, except that the criticism has been omitted. No one would learn from his account of Inkerman whether or not it was fought in the best possible way, although no doubt every reader will draw the moral for himself."—G. CHESNEY: Acad., vii. 181.

Vol. vi., 1880; vols. vii. and viii., 1887. New ed. (the 6th) of the whole work, 1877–88.

"The last volumes of Mr. Kinglake's history are marked by the excellencies and the defects conspicuous in those which have appeared before them. We admire the industrious toil of the writer. He has studied his subject with extreme care. . . . His narrative, too, many as are its faults, has the special merit that, though it enters elaborately into military details, it is easily understood by the general reader. . . . Mr. Kinglake, moreover, has a good deal of the creative and artistic faculty, if he is not a candid or a right-minded critic. . . . This conclusion of the great work of the author, we regret to say, is disfigured by faults and blemishes of the gravest kind. It is wanting in impartiality and sound discernment; it often conveys a false impression of the events which it professes to describe; and even as a composition it is not successful."—W. O'C. MORRIS: Acad., xxxii. 433.

"He has given us a work, irregular in some ways, of a composite or even barbaresque order of historic architecture, but singularly original and varied in design, singularly bright and imposing in appearance, and yet built with such an immovable solidity of inquiry into fact that it is hardly possible to conceive its foundations being shaken."—*Sat. "If somewhat lacking in the minute local descriptions which give such a charm to Mr. Parkman's volumes, Mr. Kingsford deserves especial commendation for the pains which he has taken to lay before his readers in a few lines the previous history and character of each individual who appears in his pages. The broad outlines of the history of Canadian settlement are clearly laid down; the policy which governed it is plainly indicated, and the sequence of events is traced with due attention to their relative proportion and importance."—*Sat. "Mr. Kingsley is a clever man, a warm-hearted man, and an honest man; but of all men living he is the least qualified to undertake the work of an historian or an historical professor. He confesses that his lectures are 'not, in the popular sense, history at all,' and it is beyond our power to find out any more esoteric or recondite sense in which they deserve the name."—Sat. Rev., xvii. 446.

"Whether we climb the cliffs with him, and peer over into narrow bays which are being hollowed out by the trade-surf, or wander through impenetrable forests, where the tops of the trees form a green cloud overhead, or gaze down glens which are watered by the clearest brooks, running through masses of palm and banana, and all the rich variety of foliage, we are equally delighted and amazed."—Ath., No. 2276.

"Better than a novel, even when it comes from such a masterly hand as Mr. Kingsley's, is this fresh and vigorous description of life, the life of nature and of men, as it is seen under singularly favourable conditions by an observer who has eyes keenly appreciative of beauty, and that happy art, seemingly so easy, really so difficult of attainment, of giving to others clearly intelligible pictures of what he sees. Such word-pictures Mr. Kingsley paints better than almost any man,—not so gorgeous, if the comparison may be allowed, as Mr. Ruskin's, but, to our fancy at least, clearer and more definite."—Spectator, xliv. 1571.

"This volume consists of lectures and magazine articles, some of which, but not all, come fitly under the title of 'Health and Education.' . . . He has the art, as rare as it is enviable, of giving freshness to what is familiar, and life to topics which, in the hands of a dull writer, would be hopelessly uninteresting."—Spectator, xlvii. 1434.

"It is sadly too long. It gives the incidents of his life with perfect taste indeed, but with no graphic power."—Ath., No. 2564.

"The Life and Letters have not only thrown new light on his writings and his public career. . . . Beyond and behind all this, they have brought out the man as he lived in his own home, tender and true, brave and hopeful, . . . a true and noble Christian Englishman."—T. HUGHES: Acad., xi. 44.

"The critic of these volumes is tempted, by a suggestion as illusory as it is obvious, to lament in them the loss of a great literary opportunity. It is obvious that the biographer of so striking a representative of the third party in the Church might have set before his readers a well-centred picture of an important group, a picture of course not attempted here, and indeed rendered impossible by a point of view too close to allow of a background."—Spectator, l. 84.

"As a resident and war correspondent during a sojourn of above twenty years on the Continent, he has been trained in that great school of journalism whose watchword is, 'Expand!' . . . When the most liberal deductions have been made for the glaring faults which thickly bestrew the pages of these two stout volumes, the book still remains enormously superior at all points to the 'Reminiscences' of Dr. Engel. . . . In the chapter on Wagner, in particular, he drops his turgid and facetious style, and discourses intelligently and sympathetically about that much-abused composer."—Spectator, lx. 1507.

Kingston, William Henry Giles, 1814–1880, b. in London; was for many years engaged in mercantile pursuits at Oporto, but about 1850 gave up business to devote himself to literature. He travelled in the United States and elsewhere, and was interested in colonial emigration schemes. He was an extraordinarily prolific writer of books for boys, chiefly stories of adventure, and it is doubtful whether the following list of his publications, long as it is, is complete. He also edited the Colonist, the Colonial Magazine and East India Review, the Union Jack, and Kingston's Magazine for Boys. 1. Kipling, Rudyard, b. 1865, in India, son of John Lockwood Kipling, C.I.E., (till recently principal of the Mayo School of Industrial Art, and curator of the Museum, Lahore;) educated in England; returned in 1880 to India, and contributed to local journals, and more recently to English periodicals, stories, sketches, and poems descriptive of Indian civil and military life. He now resides in London. 1. Departmental Ditties, and other Verses; 3d ed., Calcutta, 1888, 8vo.

"They possess the one quality which entitles vers de société to live. For they reflect with light gaiety the thoughts and feelings of actual men and women, and are true as well as clever. . . . In the midst of much flippancy and cynicism come notes of a pathetic loneliness and a not ignoble discontent with himself, which have something very like the ring of genius. . . . There are many stanzas and not a few poems in this little volume which go straight to the heart of all who have suffered, or are now suffering, the loneliness of tropical exile. For besides the silly little world which disports itself throughout most of the ditties, there is another Anglo-Indian world, which, for high aims and a certain steadfastness in effort after the personal interest in effort is well-nigh dead, has never had an equal in history. Some day a writer will arise—perhaps this young poet is the destined man—who will make that nobler Anglo-Indian world known as it really is. . . . Taken as a whole, his book gives hope of a new literary star of no mean magnitude rising in the east. The hand which wrote 'The Last Department' in this little volume is surely reserved for higher work than breaking those poor pretty Simla butterflies on the wheel."—Sir W. W. Hunter: Acad., xxxiv. 128.

"Brilliant sketches of the barrack-room, realistic in the best sense of the word."—Spectator, lxii. 403.

"Its wonderful trio—Mulvaney the Celt, Learoyd the Yorkshireman, and Ortheris the Cockney—are simply inimitable. They are types, it is true, but they are living types, not moribund abstractions. They positively palpitate with actuality, and we make bold to say there has never been anything like them in literature before."—Ath., No. 3261.

"This book is most refreshing. The scene of the story is laid on the banks of the great river Delaware, and a delicious sense of open air, of trees and flowers, of the many-tinted lights of sunset, tingeing the broad river and the sky above, pervades the book. . . . Although almost without plot or incident, the interest of the story never flags from the first page to the last. . . . One great charm of this book is that there are no lay figures in it."—Spectator, lviii. 647.

Kirkland, Joseph, b. 1830, in Geneva, N.Y.; son of Prof. William Kirkland (q. v., ante, vol. i.) and Mrs. Caroline Matilda Kirkland, supra; received a common-school education, and since 1856 has resided in Illinois; served in the volunteer army during the civil war, and was made major in 1863; was afterwards engaged in coal-mining in Illinois and Indiana, and now practises law in Chicago. 1. Zury, the Meanest Man in Spring County: a Novel of Western Life, Bost., 1887, 12mo.

"There are few passages in fiction more simple and truly touching than those in which Mr. Kirkland portrays the hard beginnings of pioneer life in Illinois. . . . Those gaunt, sallow, weary, world-worn women, those tireless, rude, independent, and mutually helpful men, belong to a period now driven to the farthest frontier; their look and speech are caught here with a certainty that can come only of personal knowledge. But personal knowledge alone does not suffice in such a case, and we are to be glad of an artist with clear eyes and an honest hand in the author of 'Zury,'—one incapable of painting life other than he has found it."—W. D. Howells: Harper's Magazine, lxxvii. 152.

2. The McVeys: an Episode, Bost., 1888, 12mo.

"The leading personages who figure in 'The McVeys' appeared, several of them, in 'Zury,' but they play different parts and they come to new destinies. The author has displayed great discrimination, nay, subtlety, in tracing the evolution of these primitive, eager, passionate men and women through the swiftly-transforming conditions of frontier life."—Literary World, xix. 383.

Orthodoxy from the Hebrew Point of View, Lon., 1873, 8vo. 2. Philosophy without Assumptions, Lon., 1876, 8vo.

"Mr. Kirkman's contention is that the systems of some at least of the philosophers of the age are based on not a few assumptions. . . . Mr. Spencer is the great prophet of the psychological school. . . . From the point of view of those who do not disguise their adherence to the old belief of human duty to an Infinite Ruler who knows that He is a ruler, Mr. Kirkman is amply excused if he brings all his force to bear on a system of philosophy which juggles a man at once out of his will and his subsisting personality."—*Sat. "The great merit of the book is an excellent judgment in the selection of materials. Mr. Kitchin knows well what to omit, what to abridge, what to describe at length, and he knows the proper proportions for a work like this of dissertation and narrative. . . . His style has the merits as well as the defects which commonly belong to unstudied composition; that is, it is without affectation, and has the fulness and vigour which may be expected from a mind given wholly to the matter, and not partly diverted to the manner."—Ath., No. 2406.
